

Campbell z. d. 1

TRANSACTIONS
OF THE GAELIC SOCIETY

OF DUBLIN,

ESTABLISHED

FOR THE INVESTIGATION AND REVIVAL

OF

ANCIENT IRISH LITERATURE,

CONTAINING AN ADVERTISEMENT, EXHIBITING THE VIEWS OF THE ASSOCIATION; THE LAWS FOR THE REGULATION OF THE SOCIETY; INTERESTING OBSERVATIONS ON THE GAELIC LANGUAGE; WITH SEVERAL IMPORTANT TRACTS IN THE ORIGINAL GAELIC OR IRISH, LITERALLY TRANSLATED INTO ENGLISH; ACCOMPANIED WITH NOTES AND OBSERVA-TIONS; SOME OF THE POETRY
ASCRIBED TO OISIN;
&c. &c. &c.

—○○○○—
VOL. I.
—○○○○—

Dublin.

PRINTED BY JOHN BARLOW, 29, BOLTON-STREET, PRINTER TO THE SOCIETY.

—><—

1808.

---

Entered at Stationers' Hall.

---

ADVERTISEMENT.

THE Friends of Literature, and of Ireland, are invited to join an Institution, whose purpose is to preserve and cultivate a Language the most ancient, copious, and elegant of Europe; by far the best preserved from the changes and corruptions incident to other Languages.—“Where the Language of any ancient Nation is attainable, a Criterion is discovered for distinguishing accurately the more remarkable features in the National Character. Should the Dialect be found destitute of the general Rules of grammatical Construction tion and Concordance, barren of scientific Terms, and grating in its Cadence, we may, without hesitation, pronounce that the Speakers were a rude and barbarous Nation. The case will be altered much, where we find a Language masculine and nervous; harmonious in its articulation, copious in its phrasology, and replete with those abstract and technical terms which no civilized people can want. We not only grant that the Speakers were once a thinking and cultivated People; but we must confess, that the Language itself is a species of Historic Inscription, more ancient and more authentic also, as far as it goes, than any precarious hearsay of old foreign Writers; strangers, in general, to the natural as well as to the civil History of the remote Countries they describe." "An acquaintance with the Gælic, being the Mother Tongue of all the Languages in the West, seems necessary to every Antiquary who would study the affinity of Languages, or trace the migrations of the ancient races of Mankind." And yet, it is the only Language left untaught or unstudied, which can be of use to the Classic Scholar, the Historian, and the Antiquarian, of all Europe in general, and of these Northren Nations in particular. Of late, it has attracted the attention of the Learned in different parts of Europe; and shall its beauties be neglected by those who have opportunities, from their infancy, of understanding it?

the

But is not alone to the preservation of our Language that the labors of the Society will be confined, it embraces in its views, Objects of National Importance, which will prove interesting to the Literary World. The History, civil and ecclesiastical tical of this Island, long celebrated for the Piety and Learning of its hospitable Inhabitants. The former will present a picture of the Laws, Manners, and Customs of Europe, previously to the Roman Conquest; the latter will fill a chasm in the History of Religion, during a period of darkness to Europe, save the light that shone in this Nursery of Learning. The translations of our ancient Laws, Annals, and other important Documents preserved from the ravages of time, and the more destructive waste of desolating revolutions. The affinities and connections of the ancient and modern Languages, elucidated from the Mother Tongue, formed by Fenius from the radical terms of the Languages that sprung from the confusion of Babel; the truth of which tradition is proved by the fact, since the Gaëlic will be found to contain most of the radicals and primitives tives of the various Dialects spoken from Aurora and the Ganges, to the Atlantic, the South Sea Islands, and America. The Gaëlic, says Shaw,* is the Language of Japhet, spoken before the Deluge, and probably the Language of Paradise.—Several Essays are promised on Botanical and Mineralogical Subjects: In fine, nothing shall be left unhandled which can, in any wise, tend to illustrate the History, natural, civil, and ecclesiastical, of this Kingdom, and its Sister Scotland.

The Society intend, as soon as may be, to publish every Fragment existing in the Gaëlic Language. The History of Ireland, by Dr. Keting, in the original Gaëlic, with a new Translation, will shortly be put to press. There are still,
in

* Gaëlic Dictionary. Lond. 1780. Preface.

in existence, a variety of Tracts in History, Genealogy, Law, Physic, Poetry, and Romance. The Books of Ballymote and Lecan, in the Library of the Royal Irish Academy, contain much valuable Historic matter, a large Work on Irish Topography, several curious Poems, and a vast quantity of Genealogy. In the Library of Trinity College, (to which, indeed, Ireland is much indebted for preserving her valuable Records,) are many Fragments of Laws, well worth public attention, and several Volumes of Annals. We have still, in several private hands, copies of the Annals of Innisfallen, of the four Masters of Donegal, in five large Volumes; Annals of Tigernach, Boyle, Conacht, and Ulster; the Book of Conquests; numbers of fine Poems, many Volumes of History, Biography, Romance, &c. &c. which may soon be laid before the Public.

The Society recommends itself to every liberal, patriotic, and enlightened Mind; an opportunity is now, at length, offered to the Learned of Ireland, to retrieve their Character among the Nations of Europe, and shew that their History and Antiquities are not fitted to be consigned to eternal oblivion; the Plan, if pursued with spirit and perseverance, will redound much to the Honor of Ireland.

RULES AND REGULATIONS

WHICH WERE AGREED TO AT THE FIRST GENERAL MEETING OF THE SOCIETY.

19th January, 1807.

I.

THE Society shall consist of an unlimited number of Members, governed by a President, and eight Vice-Presidents.

II.

The business of the Society shall be conducted by a Committee of twenty-one, including the Vice-Presidents, five of whom shall form a Quorum; which Committee shall be annually chosen from the whole Body

Body of the Society, and shall have power, from time to time, as occasion may require, to prepare Laws for the better regulation of the Society, which shall always be presented at the next General Meeting, for the assent and approbation of the Society.

III.

That said Committee shall meet every Monday, and shall be empowered to call an Extraordinary General Meeting of the Society, whenever they shall deem it necessary, giving six Days Notice thereof, specifying the cause of such Meeting.

IV.

The Society shall meet the first Monday of each Month, when the Proceedings of the Committee, for the intervening time, shall be laid before them.

Each

V.

Each Person, at the time of his Admission, shall pay the Sum of one Guinea.

VI.

The payment of ten Guineas at one time, or within a Year, or a Donation of Books, which the Committee shall consider of the Value of fifteen Guineas, shall constitute a Member for life, free of any Annual or Monthly Subscriptions.

VII.

Every Member shall subscribe the Sum of one Pound four Shillings British per Annum, or two Shillings British per Month, payable monthly, on the first Monday of each Month, if it shall be deemed expedient. And an Arrear of three Months, after

after the Subscriptions shall have become due, shall be deemed sufficient Cause to exclude a Member from all Privileges of the Society, from speaking or voting at any Meeting, or reading in the Library, if the Society shall find it necessary or expedient.

VIII.

A Secretary shall be elected yearly in a General Meeting; and, on same Day, the Society shall appoint some responsible Member a Bursar or Treasurer.

IX.

The Treasurer shall produce, at every General Meeting, or as often as the Committee shall think it necessary, a State of the Accounts of the Society.

The

X.

The Collector, who shall be appointed by the Treasurer, shall account with, and pay into the hands of the Treasurer, every third Monday of each Month, whatever Sum or Sums he may have collected since the preceding Settlement.

XI.

The Society may, at any time, in cases of Merit, elect Honorary Members, whose Election, as well as that of other Members, shall be conducted in the following manner, viz. the Person to be admitted, being proposed, and the Motion duly seconded and delivered in Writing to the Chairman, the Society shall proceed to the Election by Ballot, at the next General Meeting, when one Negative, in every seven Votes, shall exclude exclude the Person applying for Admission: and the Chairman shall not put any Question to the Vote until duly seconded and delivered to him in Writing; and when disposed of, he shall subscribe his Name thereto, and the Secretary shall have it entered in the Book of Proceedings, with its attending Circumstances.

XII.

Whereas it is for the Honor of all Members who may be chosen to fill the several Offices of the Society, that such Election be by the most unbiassed and voluntary Suffrages. Resolved, that any Member who shall solicit Votes, or use undue Influence to procure such Election, shall, on Conviction, be rendered incapable of ever filling any Office in the Society.

When

XIII.

When any Member speaks, he shall address himself to the Chairman, and if two or more attempt to speak at once, the Chairman shall call them to order, and determine who ought to speak first.

XIV.

The Society shall proceed to take into consideration the Order of the Day, before any new Matter be proposed or discussed: And no religious or political Debates whatever shall be permitted, such being foreign to the Object and Principles of the Society.

XV.

When the Society shall have purchased a Library, to which all Members shall have free access; the Librarian shall take care that the Books be properly and scientifically arranged, and a proper Catalogue thereof be made out, in which all Books shall be entered immediately on being received into the Library, of which said Catalogue, a complete Duplicate shall be lodged with the Treasurer; and every three Months, one of the Vice-Presidents shall visit the Library, examine the Books and Manuscripts, and report to the Society their state of preservation; and no Books or MSS shall be lent out of the Library.

XVI,

One Clerk or more, as may be necessary, shall be employed to copy Manuscripts and transact other Business of the Society.

XVII.

All Letters and Communications from country and foreign Members shall be directed rected to JOHN M'NAMARA, Esq. No. 9, Anderson's Court, Greek-street, Dublin, who shall take care to lay them before the Committee forthwith.

XVIII.

And when the Funds of the Society will allow it, Premiums shall be offered for the best Irish Compositions in Prose and Verse, and the best Translations of our ancient Laws, and other Tracts which the Society may deem worthy of Publication.

A D D R E S S

TO THE

GAELIC SOCIETY

BY THE

REV. PAUL O'BRIEN,

Gaelic Professor in the Royal College of Saint Patrick, at Maynooth.

Uthd'faigeap méanamajh Bhanba buadajg
éireh,
Ug fáiltéad d'uille na f'fílead mo nuajh a ccéjh!
Ujge f'f'ceoh, ael-agal na u'pua'd'pofe f'ael
Ujlle mh'f'Chom'é'nd'hl na ma'd'breaf'Ghaed'al.

Bare jah cejllead ó éomhó na bóéna tamh,
B'rájg ajh éomajhe a éapa ó éjan-b'p'ud' f'ann
Buan-b'lad' h'le gan d'uille gan ajh gan f'na'ad', B'á'p'tajh h'ime a'j'ó'ge'imead' ajh u'gae'cejlge luad'.

Cuajh'g

Cuajitjg an êrujine zo huje 'fa ndealrajg žman, Cnuafajò řet-mjri žac leabari ĩ řajni-žuc
 mjan,
 Cuajne cumari žac řlla òjb žaetjłge trãò,
 Cnuajò-žejri ajte žac ajeme, ĩ uajl a rãò.

Duari da econalag macrajò ba řejni-žlan cãjl Duari da řřeafzal ĩjri v'anaò a ceřjeb řãjl, Daenòac̃t řjine tre ĩneac̃ ag ĩari žac
 řluaò Daerřerř Danari a ndabajò na n-ēžerřac̃ buaò.

Eje, nallòò, buò dealabaac̃ tuaržac̃ řejri
 Ełge ealada cařmřljò-buan a ceřm Eřac̃t eazna ag řřeazna na ndařmřljec̃ êujri.
 Ełge mařeac̃ ba řeafmaac̃ a ndažrař ĩujri.

řòðla řolajòeac̃ řařžajòeac̃ řaebac̃ meaf řjalmar řòbaraac̃ cobaraac̃ trēri žan eaf řãjłeac̃

fájłteacé xeanpanta xatuŋŋŋeacé xaeðnaé taŋŋ feðrman xamunneacé caðrþemaé buaðacé breŋŋ.

Sléŋŋaŋo epiŋteoraŋo coŋniçéŋo a noðŋŋ na ternaŋ

Ðriŋŋaŋŋ xeanpa buŋ maŋç-çreaf a noðun 2hççhað

Ðanŋað buŋme ŋac oŋŋ-ŋhuŋŋ tpe aŋŋ-ŋuè beŋŋ Ðaeðŋŋŋe xnaŋaé pe aŋçŋhoŋ aŋŋ aŋçeaŋ buŋ ŋceŋŋ.

Ðar-ŋeŋi 9hbuŋian beŋo luçŋaŋŋeacé ŋçŋiŋŋo
 ŋomŋ

Ðar-ŋaeç Chonnaéç ða n-ŋŋŋal o çaeð na ttonŋ.

Ðuðer Laŋŋen aŋ ŋmuç-ðorŋað xeoŋŋ ʔŋ ŋomŋŋ, Ðoð-çlanŋ Ulað aŋ ŋomŋŋað eaéçta Chomŋŋ.

Uðeran ŋoiuŋŋ na n-Ollaŋŋ na mBaŋo ʔŋ na n-Ðriŋŋo,

Uðn-ŋa tuŋłteacé maŋ aðaŋŋ na n-ðuap-ðan ŋŋŋ

Uaŋ a ðreacéçtað ŋan aðçlçðo aŋ muað na
 nŋan,

Laðna laŋlanŋ a m-ðnaŋçeoŋŋla aŋŋ na ŋŋŋan.

Πόρδα μυσσι-έαμμαέ μιλ-μολταέ μμη-έρυτ φιαφ Πηαν-ένο μαρρεαέ τ'αν ηγεμ-έραιεβ κμηονλα βιαφ Πόρ-ρεαντ έερτ-φθεαν φα έαρέαν να μβέμηονμ φιαφ
 Πθεανταδ φμηέρεαέ κ μμηε να λαε-ερατδ λαφ.

Νυαδ-βηέτ έγλε ημη-ηλε γε-φαεμη α ηγεθε, Νυαδ-ρεлт ματδνε γε λομηεαέ με δεατραδ
 λαε,
 Νυαδ-αεφ λεμηδ αε τυμηε λαε αρφατδ τριαε,
 Νυαετ κ βμηε βηέτ ημηε αρ ηγαεδβλεε λυαδ.

Ομηηαν ημηερεεαέ αεν-φηεμηαέ φρεη-ημυλ η,
 Ομηηα ημηεφαέ ομηδεμηεαέ φυαμη-εαφ η,
 Ομη-μοφ ομηεμηαέ φοαλομη φάμη εαέ φλεε.
 Ομηε βυδ φοφγυλ τ'α γεαν-τρεεβ ταν-βεο τα τβε.

Παρε'λαν αεαρταέ φηφεοτ α ερηεεε έλεαέτ,
 Ρεηλα ββη έμηη Νεμητδ α ηγεη να ηεαέτ
 Ραμηε φα έολε φηηβολε η αρ βαεεαλαέ φεαέτ Ρημη-λεαέ Εφραμη έυε τεαφερα το ελεηη, α τρεαέτ.

Rējm žac pae n̄jm člaen a ngljad̄ no a cēpeac̄,

Rjg-ēpoba glan glējte cējmnead̄ duajm pa
fēac̄,

Rabačta daer-žuč žac d̄jlžeb' aelēmučōpeac̄,

Rōf-meala fējlteac̄ a nēul-žleō cnuaf na m-beac̄.

Suarcaf fočpošōdeac̄ fočmuleac̄ fējmjō fējnc

Suajmneaf fonašac̄ fēafmīac̄ žan žruajm žan ejnc

Sj̄n-žnā fēanōjm 'f meabajm na n-ōž žac fēf Saj̄bēaf foluaf a ccomōūjl ar ccomēnjē lejf.

Žaefžajō tajōjm žo tarēnīar tpe čuaō žuf ōeaf,

Žj̄ljjan lašajō d'fhaš žj̄f na žaēōjlžē
tēaf,

Žearmajō teanža būr tēalujm tpe mīaš
naē člaō

Žajmīēul tēalajō 'f cūm mol-ēojl' na p̄p̄reanī a mblāō.

Ապրիւ ածցլանա աջայծ յօ buan քա շլան Ասէրան քօրնօղջ նա՛ւ Եազալ յօ luan այր ան

Ար.ՇԷԾ Եաննա՛ւտ 'ք Երեքրոյն նա քօյլ օ Չիյա,

Այրիք Եստան յօ Շօնէրնօյլ քայր Չի՛ւնա՛ծ.

OBSERVATIONS
ON THE
G A E L I C   L A N G U A G E.

COMMUNICATED BY

P. M·ELLIGOTT,

OF LIMERICK,

Honorary Member of the Gaelic Society of Dublin.

OBSERVATIONS

ON THE

GAËLIC LANGUAGE.

THE Gaëlic Society having for one of their foremost objects, the revival of the language and literature of the Gaëls ; the following observations are offered to the attention of those gentlemen, who are intended to form, very shortly, a Committee for the purpose of compiling a Dictionary and Grammar* of our language, without which all attempts to restore that ancient parent tongue, and

B all

* “ It has been, if I mistake not, says Stewart, the misfortune of Gaëlic grammar, that its ablest friends have done nothing directly in its support, because they were apprehensive that they could not do every thing ;” this we have now every reason to expect will soon cease to be complained of all hopes of cherishing the present ardour for studying it, must fall to the ground; “while,” says Ledwich, (a writer who, without the slightest knowledge of our language, has yet dared to obscure and ridicule our antiquities) “the Irish preserved their ancient LANGUAGE and dress, there was no hope of civilizing them, or bringing them to an acquiescence in English dominion or English laws.”*

The short-sighted policy of endeavouring totally to eradicate the native dialect of any conquered country, (so contrary to the practice of the most enlightened nations of antiquity, who, far from the vain attempt of utterly abolishing, wisely adopted the very language, laws, customs, and superstitions of the vanquished, and endeavoured, as far as possible, to incorporate with and assimilate them to their own,) has long been considered unnecessary and ineffectual, all arguments then on this head we shall pass over as nugatory; the sentiments, however, of Stewart, a very learned Scot, in the introduction to his excellent and judicious grammar of the Gaëlic language† must not be here omitted.

* Antiq. Ireland, Dub. 1790. p. 346.

† Edinburgh. 12mo. 1801.

omitted. “ The utility, says he, of a grammar of the Scottish Gaëlic will be variously appreciated. Some will be disposed to deride the vain endeavour to restore vigour to a decaying superannuated language. They who reckon on the extirpation of the Gaëlic a necessary step toward that general extention of the English, which they deem essential to the political interest of the Highlands, will condemn every project which seems likely to retard its education. Those who consider that there are many parts of the Highlands where the inhabitants can, at present, receive no useful knowledge whatever, except through the channel of their native tongue, will probably be of opinion that the Gaëlic ought at least to be tolerated. Yet these too may condemn as useless, if not ultimately detrimental, any attempt to cultivate its powers, or to prolong its existence. Others will entertain a different opinion. They will judge from experience as well as from the nature of the case, that no measures, merely of a literary kind, will prevail to hinder the progress of the English language over the Highlands; while general convenience and emolument, not to mention private emulation and vanity, conspire to facilitate its introduction, and prompt the natives to its acquisition. They will perceive,

at

at the same time, that while the Gaëlic continues to be the common speech of multitudes ; while the knowledge of many important facts, of many necessary arts, of morals, of religion, and of the laws of the land, can be conveyed to them only by means of this language ; it must be of material service to preserve it in such a state of cultivation and purity as that it may be fully adequate to these valuable ends ; in a word, that while it is a living language, it may answer the purpose of a living language."

The daily decrease of piety, the narrow limits of true religion, and the little dissemination of it from the difficulty of intercourse with the lower classes of the people, the uncertainty and danger attending decisions on the lives and properties of millions of our fellow-subjects, and the mutual distrust of the different orders of society ; these, I say, are more than sufficient to rouse the energy, and awake the attention of the legislature, the Clergy, and every man who wishes well to his country. The present state of Gaëlic literature is nearly what that of the Persian was when the great Sir William Jones wrote his grammar of that beautiful language. "Since the literature of Asia,"

Asia," says that admirable scholar,* "was so much neglected, and the causes of that neglect were so various, we could not have expected that any slight power would rouse the nations of Europe from their inattention to it; and they would, perhaps, have persisted in despising it, if they had not been animated by the most powerful incentive that can influence the mind of man: interest was the magic wand which brought them all within one circle; interest was the charm which gave the languages of the East a real and solid importance. By one of those revolutions, which no human prudence could have foreseen, the Persian language found its way into India; that rich and celebrated empire, which, by the flourishing state of our commerce, has been the source of incredible wealth to the merchants of Europe. A variety of causes, which need not be mentioned here, gave the English nation a most extensive power in that kingdom: our India company began to take under their protection the princes of the country, by whose protection they gained their first settlement; a number of important affairs were to be transacted in

in

* Page ix, pref. grammar of the Persian language, Lond. 4to, 1804.

in peace and war, between nations equally jealous of one another, who had not the common instrument of conveying their sentiments; the servants of the company received letters which they could not read, and were ambitious of gaining titles of which they could not comprehend the meaning; it was found highly dangerous to employ the natives as interpreters, upon whose fidelity they could not depend; and it was at last discovered, that they must apply themselves to the study of the Persian language, in which all the letters from the Indian princes were written.”

The old objections, of want of encouragement, scarcity of books, &c.* will now soon be removed; our fine poems and other literary productions will no longer rot in the dust of libraries neglected and unknown;

* One of the greatest difficulties a student in the Gaëlic has to contend with, is, the great difficulty of procuring books, our MSS are dispersed through the different libraries of Europe, and are rarely ever looked at, except as curious exotics. The few printed books we have are mostly catechisms, or other religious compositions, little calculated to interest a learner. Were it not for the very laudable intentions of the Gaëlic Society to publish all the venerable remains of our literature, unknown; and amidst the present general taste for learning, the ardour of studying the Gaëlic, now happily excited, will, I trust, not be suffered to abate. The beauties and excellence of our language must soon be seen and admired; a language copious, elegant, and harmonious, ancient above all the languages of the world, yielding to none, not even to the Greek, in the beauty and elegance of its compounds, its flexibility, the sweetness of its cadences, and peculiar aptness for music and poetry; a language, in fine, highly cultivated and admired by the most polite and learned princes of the world, at a time when the Gaëls alone, of all the nations in Europe, were free from barbarism and ignorance, and stood unrivaled in the cultivation of letters.* If this were not confessedly the character of the literature, we might soon say with the Patriarch of Antioch, Stephanus Petrus, “I nostri libri sono andati tutti sotto l’acqua e fuochi, e, mancando chi scriva di nuovo, li libri antichi sono andati sempre scemando; e non si son conservati per lo più, se non i libri ch’erano necessarii per il culto della santissima religione.”

Gaëlic

Ireland, for some centuries, was deemed the greatest school for learning in Europe. Its happy situation, however, did not perpetuate these blessings. Ireland

was Gaëlic, the impartial testimonies of the best scholars of Europe, of Leibnitz, Usher, Vallancey, Lhuyd, Boulet, Davies, and others,* would be more than sufficient

was invaded by the Danes, and in a subsequent age, made subject to the kings of England. Though there were English Colonies in Ireland, the Gaël of that country enjoyed their own laws and customs till the reign of Elizabeth and James I. when the English laws were universally established. Then, for the first time, the Gaëlic ceased to be spoken by the chiefs of families, and at court; and English schools were erected, with strict injunctions, that the vernacular language should no longer be spoken in these seminaries. Shaw's Gaëlic Grammar, Edinb. 1778.

* The Irish language is free from the anomalies, sterility, and heteroclitic redundances, which mark the dialects of barbarous nations; it is rich and melodious; it is precise and copious, and affords those elegant conversations which no other than a thinking and lettered people can use or require. Vallancey's essay on the Gaëlic language, p. 3.

“ Est quidem lingua Hibernica, et elegans cum primis, et opulenta: sed ad rem isto modo excolendam, (sicuti reliquas ferè Europæ Linguas vernaculas intra hoc sæculum excultas videmus) nondum extitit hactenus, qui animum adjiceret.” Epist. I. Usserii Ardmach. Archiep. 186.

Postremo, ad perficiendam, vel certe valde promovendam literaturam Celticam, diligentius linguæ Hibernicæ studium.

sufficient to establish it, and excite, at least, a curiosity among the learned, and enquiries into its merits.

CHAPTER II.

It is not here my intention to lay down any regular system of grammar, nor to enter into a minute discussion of all the niceties of the language, but merely to point out a few subjects which have not hitherto been attended to. And first, we shall speak of the dialects, which certainly are worthy of particular notice. Of these our grammarians reckoned five, viz. the Berla Feine, Berla Brethun, Berla Dan, Berla Staire, Berla Tebidhe or Gnoath-bherla. “A man of erudition,” says Vallancey, “tolerably skilled in Greek and Latin, will soon acquire every dialect, the first excepted, with more ease

C

studium adjungendum censeo, ut Lwydius egregie facere cepit.—Ex Hibernicis, vetustiorum adhuc Celtarum, Germanorumque, et, ut generaliter dicam, accolarum oceani Britannici cismarinorum antiquitates illustrantur. Leibnitz. Collect. Etymolog. Vol. I. p. 153.

ease than he did the rudiments of Greek or Latin. He will discover the fallacy of those Irish writers, and perceive that there are but two dialects, the Feini and Gnath, i. e. the Fenian and the common, the first was, like the Mandarin language of the Chinese, known only to the learned, and the science of jurisprudence was committed to this dialect." This was not asserted hastily, inasmuch as the Berla Feine differs from the Gnath-bherla or common dialect, as it was spoken in the time of Oisín, not in words alone, but a great deal too in Syntax, as may be seen by consulting the Brehon laws, and other documents preserved in the libraries of Trinity College and of this Society.

Our old poets, indeed, borrowed frequently from the Berla Feine, and incorporated it so with the common dialect, that the Idiom and Syntax of the latter underwent some little alteration, whereby it is impossible even for natives to read the poems of Mælmuire-Othna, Fintán, Cinfoela, O'Hartigan, O'Flin, and others, without a knowledge of the Berla Feine, which is now as nearly connected with the common dialect, as the Arabic with the Persian, or the Chaldee with the Hebrew. There is another dialect spoken in the county of Cork, and a little in in Limerick, Clare, and Kerry, called Berlagar na Sær, (*bērlaḡar̄n̄ na s̄ær̄n̄**) or Masons' Jargon, which seems to me to be a remnant of some of the languages or dialects above mentioned, and from the following specimen it will appear to be ancient and worth preserving :

Εἷς or æς a man, Heb. שׂוֹן (aish or ish.) We say in the common dialect æς δᾶνα, poets, i. e. men of poetry; æς εἰύη, musicians or men of music, &c.

Ḅē or buaḋ, a woman.

Ḅoḋna, the sea.

Ḍερε, an eye, Gr. Δερεω (derco) I see.

Lonḡar̄n̄ or lonḡ̄uar̄n̄, a bed.

Laḡs, a hand, vid. O'Brien.

Ḍες,

* This word, bērlaḡar̄n̄, is not to be found in any dictionary, nor do I recollect ever to have seen it used, except by Donlevy in the following passage : “ Ν̄ḡḋ, buḋ no ḋεcarr̄ a ḋēnaḋ, δᾶ ccuḡar̄ḡḋe an τ-ḡḡar̄n̄on̄ ann ḡac̄ uḡe bērlaḡar̄n̄ Ḕccof-ḡuḡl̄ malarr̄ac̄, ḋa labarr̄car̄ n̄ḡ h-Ḕḋ ᾰn̄ar̄n̄ ann ḡac̄ τḡn̄, ac̄τ̄ ḡḋḡ a mōr̄an̄ ḋo n̄ḡn̄-Ḕr̄ḡeas̄b̄ ac̄ar̄ ḋ̄ jarccūlar̄ḡ ḡac̄a ḡḡac̄ca, bēḡ-naḔ̄ ar̄n̄ ḡe-aḋ na h-Ḕḋḡpa. Christian Doewine, p. 430. Paris, 1742. 8vo.

Ἐς, land, des. Hindostanicé.

Ἐξέρουε, be off, run away; Ἐξέρουε ὄμ ἐαί get out of my way.

Ἐπιεὺς, God, the Lord.

Ἐπιεὺς, the Sun.

Ἐπίς, night.

Ἐπιεὺς Ἐπίς, Moon, nocturnal luminary.

Ἐπίς, water.

Ἐπίς or ἐπιεὺς, fire.

Ἐπίς, a river.

Ἐπίς, a tree.

Ἐπίς, a house.

Ἐπίς, a horse,

Ἐπίς, a dog.

Ἐπίς, a way, passage.

But leaving those for a separate treatise, we shall here only notice what may be more strictly termed dialects, or formæ loquendi, of which we may reckon two in the Gaëlic, viz. the Scotch or Erse,* and Manx, which proceed from, and are varieties of the

* I believe that by this word Erse, was formerly meant Irish, and that it was corrupted from it by a too quick pronunciation.

the Irish.* “The Scots and Irish Gaëlic,” says Shaw, “though not radically different, are two “separate dialects of the same language. The “words are almost always the same, but differently “orthographied. The Irish, in their grammars, “have a more uncertain and various inflection in “the termination, which the Scots Gaëlic has not;
 “and this inclines me to think that the Scots is the “original, and that this inflection of termination “in Irish grammars is the mark of an attempt by
 “the monks to polish it, after the manner of the Greek “and Latin.”† But not to speak of orthography,
 in

* I shall not here remark the various provincial dialects of Scotland and Ireland, with the differences of pronunciation, being too numerous for the limits of this paper. Not only the several provinces of Ireland, says Donlevy, have a different way of pronouncing, but also the very counties, and even some baronies in one and the same county, differ in the pronunciation: Nay, some cantons pronounce so oddly, that the natural sound of both the vowels and consonants, whereof (even according to themselves) the words consist, is utterly lost in their mouths.

† It is almost unnecessary here to point out Mr. Shaw's error, it being universally admitted that the mode of declension, by varying the termination, was more ancient than that of adding particles, and the Goths, Vandals, Moors, in which it must be apparent to every scholar, that the Irish have paid the most attention to the philosophy

Moors, and other barbarians, finding it too troublesome to recollect the various terminations of the Greek and Latin nouns, had recourse to a vast number of detached particles; so where the Latins wrote musæ, musam, musâ, the Italians will now have della musa, alla musa, &c. "The various terminations of the same word, "whether verb or noun," says Dr. Campbell, "are "always conceived to be more intimately connected "with the term which they serve to lengthen, than the "additional, detached, and in themselves insignificant "particles, which we are obliged to employ as connectives "to our significant words. Our method gives almost "as much exposure to the one as to the other, mak- "ing the significant parts and the insignificant equally "conspicuous; theirs much oftner sinks, as it were, "the former into the latter, at once preserving their "use and hiding their weakness. Our modern lan- "guages may, in this respect, be compared to the art "of the carpenter in its rudest state; when the union of "the materials, employed by the artisan, could be effect- "ed only by the help of those external and coarse "implements, pins, nails, and cramps. The ancient "languages resemble that art in its most improved state, "after the invention of dovetail joints, grooves, and "mortices; when thus all the principal junctions are "effected, by forming properly the extremities or ter- "minations of the pieces to be joined. For, by means "of these, the union of the parts is rendered closer, "while that by which that union is produced is scarcely "perceivable." Philosophy of Rhetoric, Vol. II. p. 412.

philosophy of the language; the principal peculiarities of the Highland dialects of the Gaëlic are these, viz.

The nominative plural ends mostly in an, as maicéan, chiefs; lamán, hands; mísan, months; this is a corruption borrowed from the Saxon, and ought to be exploded; so in old English writers, we find, eyen, shoen, for eyes, shoes, &c.

The genitives plural do not suffer suppression of the first consonant, as nan coꝝ, nan ceann, nam bapꝝ, nan cnam, &c. for na ceoꝝ or ꝥeoꝝ, &c.

They write ur tꝥearna, our Lord; ar buacásl, our boy; ar dja, bur hajim, bur coꝝ, &c. for ar tꝥearna, or ar tꝥearna, ar mbuacásl, ar n-dja, bur n-hajim, bur ceoꝝ.

am for an, before the letters b, ꝥ, p, as am ꝥer the man, for an ꝥer, (but properly write an in the genitive, as an ꝥhꝥ;) am ball, am þꝥhꝥa.

ur and at, for úr, ur, úr, as ꝥelꝥar, a hunter.

Ḃlyche for aḡḡhe, as ḡcēlaḡēe for ḡcēlaḡōe, a story-teller.

Ḃlé for úḡ, as ḡḡaḡaéaḡ, loving, for ḡḡaḡúḡaḡ.

ḡḡ for me, I, me.

Chaḡḡ, he went, for éuaḡḡ.

Smith, who published some exquisitely beautiful fragments of Gaēlic Poetry,* corruptly writes ḡḡoḡ for ḡ'ḡḡoḡ or ḡ'ḡḡḡ, as

Rinn e miolaran, 's thug leum gabhaidh

Le mar aoibhneas ghios na traghla.

Page 9.

Le cirbibh an trusgain dathta,

Tha iad a leum ghios na doimhne,

Muca mara ri sgreadail,

Is tonna gam freagairt o'n aibheinn.

Page 170.

Critheach, deurach, ghios an doruis,

Bu chosmhuil è re Laoch ag iomchar,

Mic

* Sean dana le Oisian, Orran, Ullan, &c. Edin 1787.

Mic a mhic gu leabuidh thosdaich,
Thuit é san starnaich air Crígeal.

Page 291.

Participles end in τα and τε, as lúbτα, bent, μπροστέ turned; which the modern Irish, probably, corruptly soften into τha and the, and write and pronounce lúbta, μπροστé. Their verbs are also inflected, in many respects, differently from the Irish, and with a greater use of the auxiliary verb τάμ, I am. See Shaw's and Stewart's Gaëlic grammars:

Seann, old, is corruptly written with two n's. It is correctly written in Ireland sean or sen, whence senex,* in Latin, Gen. senis, i. e. sen eis or sen aes, an old man, Hebr. שׁנ, (ish or eish) a man. See specimen of the βέηλαγαρη na sepe. p. 11.

Cho or éa for h́, as éa 'n 'eisl for h́ fhil, or probably for noéa or noéo, which the Irish

D

sometimes

* Where the Latins write X, the Gaëls write S, as in, Dexter, G. tejs, Fax, a torch, G. asat or casat, i. e. lasat, burning. Sextus, sejsat. Ex, as. The Latins say mixtus or mistus, mixtura or mistura.

sometimes write, as  $\mu\acute{o}\acute{\sigma}\theta$   $\eta$ - $\psi$ υ $\lambda$ .  $\tau$ η $\psi$ η $\tau$  for  $\tau$ υ $\beta$ α $\eta$ η $\tau$ , he said.

The MANX, though easily understood by a Gaëlic scholar, is still a little more distant from the language of Ireland; its most apparent dialectic differences, not to mention some peculiar idioms, are these, viz.

The nominative plural, like the Scotch, ends in  $\eta$ , as  $\mu$ α $\epsilon$ ϑ, a thing, pl.  $\mu$ α $\epsilon$ ϑ $\alpha$  $\eta$ ;  $\xi$ ϑ $\acute{\omega}$  $\tau$  $\alpha$  $\eta$ , words;  $\beta$ ρ $\epsilon$ ψ $\epsilon$ ν $\eta$  $\eta$  $\alpha$  $\tau$  $\alpha$  $\eta$ , judgments;  $\lambda$ ϑ $\acute{\epsilon}$  $\tau$  $\alpha$  $\eta$ , faults;  $\alpha$  $\eta$  $\mu$ α $\eta$  $\eta$  $\alpha$  $\eta$ , souls.

A final vowel is lost, as in  $\tau$ η $\xi$ ε $\alpha$  $\eta$  $\eta$ ,  $\tau$ α $\eta$  $\eta$  $\tau$  $\tau$  $\tau$ ,  $\alpha$  $\eta$  $\eta$  $\tau$ ,  $\eta$  $\eta$  $\eta$  $\alpha$ ϑ $\tau$ , for  $\tau$ η $\xi$ ε $\alpha$  $\eta$  $\eta$  $\alpha$ ,  $\tau$ α $\eta$  $\eta$  $\tau$  $\tau$  $\alpha$ ,  $\alpha$  $\eta$  $\eta$  $\tau$  $\tau$  $\epsilon$ ,  $\alpha$  $\eta$  $\eta$  $\tau$  $\alpha$ ,  $\eta$  $\eta$  $\eta$  $\alpha$ ϑ $\tau$  $\alpha$ , &c.

$\tau$  is added to participles, as  $\epsilon$ υ $\eta$  $\tau$ ,  $\psi$ α $\psi$ ε $\psi$ η $\tau$ , for  $\epsilon$ υ $\eta$ , putting;  $\psi$ α $\psi$ ε $\psi$  $\eta$ , seeing; but this corruption obtains also in the spoken language of Ireland; and also to nouns, adverbs, &c. as  $\eta$ η $\tau$  for  $\eta$ η $\tau$ ,  $\tau$ ο $\psi$ α $\acute{\epsilon}$  $\tau$  for  $\tau$ ο $\psi$ α $\acute{\epsilon}$ .

They

They write  $\epsilon\mu\omicron\upsilon\epsilon$  for  $\epsilon\mu\omicron\epsilon$ , a hill ;  $\tau\omicron$  for  $\zeta\omicron$  or  $\epsilon\omicron$ ; as  $\tau\omicron$   $\mu\alpha\upsilon\tau\epsilon$ , well, for  $\zeta\omicron$   $\mu\alpha\upsilon\tau\epsilon$ , and sometimes for  $\alpha\zeta$ ; as  $\tau\omicron$   $\mu\omicron\lambda\alpha\tau\omicron$  for  $\alpha\zeta$   $\mu\omicron\lambda\alpha\tau\omicron$ , praising ;  $\alpha\zeta\alpha\mu$ ,  $\alpha\zeta\alpha\tau$ ,  $\alpha\zeta\alpha\mu\mu$ , &c. for  $\alpha\zeta\alpha\mu$ ,  $\alpha\zeta\alpha\tau$ ,  $\alpha\zeta\alpha\mu\mu$ , with me, thee, us.

$\alpha\zeta$  is often omitted before participles, as  $\tau\alpha$   $\mu\mu\mu$   $\zeta\upsilon\tau\epsilon$  for  $\alpha\zeta$   $\zeta\upsilon\tau\epsilon$ .

$\mathcal{N}\alpha\mu$  or  $\mu\mu\mu$  for  $\alpha\mu$ , as  $\alpha\mu\mu$   $\mu\alpha\mu$   $\mu\omicron\mu$  for  $\alpha\mu\mu$   $\alpha\mu$   $\mu\omicron\mu$ , for our sake.

$\mu\omicron\mu\mu\tau$ ,  $\mu\omicron\mu\tau$ , for  $\mu\omicron\mu\mu\mu\tau\epsilon$ ,  $\mu\omicron\mu\mu\tau\epsilon$ , &c.

Change  $\epsilon$  and  $\zeta$  into  $\tau$ , as  $\mu\omicron\mu\tau$ ,  $\tau\mu\mu\tau\epsilon$ , for  $\mu\omicron\mu\epsilon$ , understanding ;  $\tau\mu\mu\tau\epsilon$ , knowledge ;  $\mu\epsilon\alpha\mu\tau\omicron\mu$  for  $\mu\epsilon\alpha\mu\epsilon\tau\omicron\mu$ , evening.

The following specimens may tend to point out to the Manx the proper orthography of their dialect, and induce them to restore it.

THE LORD'S PRAYER,

FROM THE MANX BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

London, 1767.

Ayr ain t' ayns niau; Casherick dy row dt' Ennym. Dy jig dty reeriaght. Dt' aigney dy row jeant er y thalloo, myr te ayns niau. Cur dooin nyn arran jiu as gaghlaa. As leih dooin nyn loghtyn, myr te shin leih dauesyn ta jannoo loghtyn nyn oi. As ny leeid shin ayns miolagh; Agh livrey shin veih olk.

THUS PROPERLY ORTHOGRAPHIED:

ʒl̄t̄aj̄r̄ j̄nn̄ t'̄ ainn̄q̄ n̄einn̄, coʒ̄r̄r̄ec'̄ d̄o*̄ n̄aj̄b̄ d'̄ aj̄nn̄, d̄o t̄j̄s̄ d̄o n̄j̄n̄āēt̄.†̄ D'̄ aʒ̄ne d̄o n̄aj̄b̄ d̄ēn̄c'̄ aj̄r̄ a t̄alānn̄, maʒ̄ t̄a ainn̄q̄ n̄einn̄. Cuʒ̄r̄ d̄új̄nn̄ n̄j̄nn̄ aʒ̄ān̄ d'̄ j̄nn̄i'̄ aʒ̄ ʒ̄āē l̄ā. ʒ̄l̄q̄ l̄eʒ̄ē d̄új̄nn̄ n̄j̄nn̄ lōēt̄an̄, maʒ̄ t̄a

* D̄o for ʒ̄o.

† For n̄j̄n̄āēt̄.

ta shin lejt dojb-fan ta 'dēnani loētan 'n
 jni aēajō. 'Uf nē lejt shin annf' mēlaē.
 Uēn lēbraj shin be* oē.

Psalm 86.

VULGAR MANX.

PROPER

ORTHOGRAPHY.

- |  |   |
|--|---|
| 1. Crom dty chleaysh,         O Hiarn, as clasht         rhyrn, son ta mee         boght, as ayns trej-         hys.              | CROM DO ēIUAF, O         THĠĠEARN' 'AF CLOST         RYOM, SON TA MYF         BOēt 'AF ANNf' TREJ-         TEF. †              |
| 2. Freill uss m' annym,         son ta mee ynric, my         Yee, saue dty harvaant         ta coyrt e hresteil ayn-         yds. | FREILLŌ ēUFA M' ANAM,         SON TĀ MĠ JNNRYE,         MO THJA, FABA DO         ĠEPBĀNT TA CUYT         A ĠREJTEJL    JNNADŌf |

3. Bee

* i. e. ō. This particle is lost in the Gaëlic, though in the old MSS we frequently meet buajni from me, buajt from thee, buajni from us; in which be from, is preserved.

† Scot. and Manx. for me.

‡ From trejt.

§ i. e. cojnēd, keep, guard, preserve.

|| i. e. tojē, toēēuf, hope, trust.

3. Bee trocoil dooys, O Hiarn; son nee'm geamagh orts gagh-laa.      ὀϊ τροκοιλ* ὀανι-φ' ο ἰγθεαρη'; φον ἕηημ ἕῆμαε ορη φ' ἕαε λᾶ.
4. Gerjee annym dty harvant: son hoods, O Hiarn, ta mee troggal seose m' annym.      ἕαρηῖ ἀναμ ὀ φεη-βᾶρητ, φον εὐῖα ὀφ', ο ἰγθεαρη', τα μη τροῖβαητ φαφα μ' ἀναμ.
5. Son tow uss, Hiarn, mie as graysoil, as jeh myghin vooar davesan ooilley ta geamagh ort.      Σον τα τῶ-φ', ἰγθεαρη', μαῖε 'αφ ἕρηφωη, † 'αφ ὀε μϑηηης μηηη ὀῖβφαν ηηε τα ἕῆμαε ορητ.

FROM

* i. e. τροκαηηεαε, merciful.

† i. e. αῖ τροῖβαητ, lifting up.

‡ i. e. ἕρηφαναηη, ηο, μαῖεφεαε, ηο, μαῖε-ηεαε.

§ I know not the root of this word, nor shall I venture to point out the proper spelling, it means KINDNESS, MERCY.

FROM THE BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

Ramsay, 1769.

EAISHT rish my ghuee, Hiarn, as gys m'eam
 Cur cleiyash as bee foayroil;
 As lurg dty gialdyn firrinagh,
 Cur dou ansoor graysoil.
 Ec stoyl dty chiarys dy ve try't,
 Ny briwnys mee dy-gyere;
 Son ayns dty hilley dooinney bio
 Cha vel veih peccah seyr.

PROPER SPELLING,

According to the Manx dialect.

Eisht ny mo ghuee, hiar, as gys m'eam cur cleiyash
 Cur cleiyash as bee foayroil;
 'As lurg doo gialdyn firrinagh,
 Cur dou ansoor (ansoor) graysoil.
 Ec stoyl dty chiarys doo ve try't,
 Ny briwnys mee dy-gyere,
 Son ayns dty hilley dooinney bio
 Cha vel veih peccah seyr*

SON

* i. e. Do not judge me with severity.

Son annq' do ijllëd tujne beo *Cha b'fisl be peccatð faer.

DHYTS ver-ym booise; my Hiarn, as ree
 Dty volley hoilsh-ym magh;
 Shoh currym ghoym myr keesh dy eek.
 As bannee-'m oy dy bragh.
 T'ow chiarn er-skyn yn rooshtyn ain,
 Dy choyrt dhyt molley cair.
 D'ard-ooashley ta er-skyn nyn maght,
 Ta 'n tushtey ain ro ghiare, &c.

Duytq' bejym bujðe'cafa, mo thjðearn, 'q' nje,
 Do mqlatð ijllqjym 'mach;
 So curiam sabam myr e'f do je.
 'Nq' bejjym tu do bract
 Ta tje'arn ajp-'f-cjmm jn roftan ajnt

Do

* i. e. N'j fisl ð'n peccatð faer.

† i. e. So bract or so bractac, for ever.

‡ i. e. The Lord is above our comprehensions; roft is used for roftc, understanding.

Do éur* duje molað corj;
 D'arð-uajfle ta aji-ʳ-cjnn njnn mach†
 Ta 'n tujfe† aji no ðejn.

CHAPTER III.

THE Society having come to a Resolution of improving the Language, by restoring the ancient and proper orthography in works published by them, and of rejecting, except where it may be necessary for the Poet, the modern rule of “cael “ne cael, acas leðan ne leðan;”§ it may be

E necessary

* j. do éur.

† i. e. Above our power; Macht, might. Teutonicé.
 hence cumachz.

‡ For tujfe.

§ The vowels in Gaëlic are divided into broad a, o, u, and slender e, y; this rule, then, I know not why, requires the first vowel in every syllable to be of the same class with the last vowel in the preceding one—See M'Curtin, Vallancey, Stewart. Grammarians have so often found the inconvenience arising from this, that it should be entirely exploded.

necessary to remark, first, that the ancients never wrote αθ, but αε or αη, and sometimes οε; and this is the true orthography, and agrees with the modern pronunciation. The modern Irish and Scots write caol, daol, aof, xaodai, but pronounce kbale, dbale, ace, ghay-al, as the ancients did, who wrote cael, dael, aef or afh,* xaedai. Secondly, the ancients rarely wrote, ca, (ca) where it is now used; and though the character, like our English f, which frequently occurs in the MSS, be generally supposed to be a contraction of ea, yet it may be easily proved, that ANCIENTLY it always stood for e BROAD.†

The

* αε and αη are often written indifferently in the oldest MSS, as in the Λεβαν Λεαῖη or book of Lecan, p. 31, c. 1. “μη εεετ αφη μη τομουη,” “the first age of the world.” So the Latins write æ where the Greeks write α, as Cæsar, Dæmon, Greek Καισαρ, Δαίμων, Kaisar, Daimon, which the ancient Gaëls pronounced as the Latins did, vide aef, in the specimen of the Berlagair na Saer; but in general αη was used in inflections of words where αθ is now used. The Greeks probably pronounced α like the English ay, in lay, day, way; or ai in flail, wail.

† In the book of Lecan, in the library of the Royal Irish

The  $\epsilon$  in  $\varphi\epsilon\eta$ ,\* old,  $\varphi\epsilon\eta$ , a man,  $\epsilon\epsilon\tau$ , leave, is pronounced nearly as if it were an  $a$ , and so the French pronounced it in the termination, ment, as in firmament, doucement, particulièrement; also in the words entendre, en, entre, prendre, &c. but in the words  $\varphi\epsilon\eta$ , prosperity;  $\varphi\epsilon\eta$ , grass;  $\epsilon\epsilon\tau$ , first; or according to the more modern mode of spelling,  $\varphi\epsilon\alpha\eta$ ,  $\varphi\epsilon\alpha\eta$  or  $\varphi\epsilon\alpha\eta$ ,  $\epsilon\epsilon\alpha\tau$  or  $\epsilon\epsilon\alpha\tau$ , it is pronounced as a in the English words, fare, mare, cane. Thirdly, every one will see the propriety of rejecting the letter  $\sigma$ , as recommended by Stewart, in words in which it is not radical, as in  $\varphi\sigma\eta\eta$ , white,  $\varphi\sigma\eta$ , wine,  $\varphi\sigma\eta$ , true, and such like; which should be written  $\varphi\eta\eta$ ,  $\varphi\eta$ ,  $\varphi\eta$ .

The

Irish Academy, p. 2, c. 1, the following passage occurs, which will clearly prove this assertion, viz.

батар тпену ѳпа треѳ тѳи,
 Seét meje aπdōmōa Etleññ.

Now if “ $\sigma$ ” be the same as  $\epsilon\alpha$ , the Poet would have erred in making  $\tau\sigma\eta$  or  $\tau\epsilon\alpha\eta$  correspond with  $E\tau\epsilon\eta$ ; moreover the word  $\varphi\epsilon\alpha\eta$ , is often written in MSS of late date  $\varphi\sigma\eta$ , and so of others.

\* This agrees with the Latin sen-er, and yet the moderns will have  $\varphi\epsilon\alpha\eta$ ,  $\varphi\epsilon\alpha\eta$ ,  $\epsilon\epsilon\alpha\tau$ , &c, so  $\epsilon\epsilon\alpha\tau$ , a Tinker, Hib.  $\epsilon\epsilon\eta\tau$ ; certus,  $\epsilon\epsilon\eta\tau$ ; fert,  $\epsilon\epsilon\eta\tau$ .

The following hints are offered for the further consideration of grammarians :

The aspirated letters are always distinguished by dots placed over them ; but on inspecting the old vellum MSS, a variety of marks or aspirations will appear, which cannot fail to impress the reader with a belief of their having different significations ; the ignorance, however, or neglect of early copists, with respect to their original meaning, putting over the same letters, in the same page, marks or aspirations of different powers, has hitherto deterred our grammarians from making observations on them, or endeavouring to remove this obscurity and confusion ; but it is not alone in MSS we find a variety of these marks, those who first cut Irish type seem to have been not entirely ignorant of the use of these aspirations ; for, in almost all our printed books we find our letter c in its aspirated form, marked with a comma thus, ć, (ch) which the Greeks used for our letter b. But in the Παράδεισος αν ανμα, or Paradise of the Soul, a small book printed at Lovain, we see three kinds of aspirations used, though without system ;* and, in

* See the word έυνοια, page 3, wherein the letter c is aspirated with a comma, the η with a mark somewhat like a v, and the ζ with a dot.

in closely inspecting the Irish grammar, published by Hugh M'Crutin in 1728, six or seven kinds of aspirations may be discovered; this, therefore, induces me to think that the following arrangement, which has seemed plausible to several learned members of the Society, will tend much to facilitate the study of the language.

The letters b and m, being usually pronounced as v. when aspirated, should be written in their aspirate form, with a mark like the letter v over them, as they frequently occur in the oldest MSS.*
C and ç, which when aspirated, take the sound
of

* Our grammarians are grossly mistaken when they assert that our oldest MSS were without points or aspirations; I challenge a single manuscript to be produced, in which these aspirations are omitted; they should have said that "it was probable the ancient pronunciation differed from the modern by retaining the sounds of many consonants, which we now aspirate, or that the ancients thought it superfluous to mark these letters where they were always pronounced as aspirate;" so the French consider it useless to mark the d in bled, 'corn,' &c. the pronunciation of the word being universally known to be ble. There is no language on earth has more quiescent letters than the French, and yet that is not thought a disadvantage, nor is the English very free free

of  $\text{ch}$  and  $\text{ph}$ ," as in  $\text{moch}$ , early,  $\text{mo phēnu}$ , my pen, should be marked with a comma;  $\text{f}$  and  $\text{c}$  lose their own sound entirely, and take that of  $\text{h}$ , and in old MSS are marked in their aspirate form with a kind of old  $\text{h}$ , which we find in the Irish alphabet in O'Conor's dissertations; and  $\text{t}$ ,  $\text{g}$ ,  $\text{z}$ , which, when aspirated, lose their sound almost entirely, are written in their aspirate form with a dot ( $\cdot$ ) over them,† as they occur in the MSS thus,  $\text{t}^{\cdot}$ ,  $\text{g}^{\cdot}$ ,  $\text{z}^{\cdot}$ ‡ So much for improvement
in

free from them; the  $\text{gh}$  is not pronounced in thought, fought, bought, sought; nor the  $\text{b}$  in limb, comb, plumb; the  $\text{ch}$ , in yacht; the  $\text{g}$  in gnat, gnaw, gnash; the  $\text{k}$  in knot, kneel, knight, knowledge, &c. &c. beside the uncertainty of pronunciation, as in the words gin, gibe, the letters  $\text{gi}$ , are not pronounced the same as in gig, girl, &c.

\* So in Greek,  $\alpha$ ,  $\text{c}$ ,  $\pi$ ,  $\text{p}$ , are commutable with  $\chi$ ,  $\text{ch}$ , and  $\phi$ ,  $\text{ph}$ .

† A dot under a letter in the MSS signifies that that letter is to be omitted.

‡ In our old MSS the letters  $\text{h}$  and  $\text{r}$  frequently occur aspirated or marked with a dot or point over them;  $\text{r}$  and  $\text{l}$  are frequently doubled in the beginning of a word,

in the letters, which will be adopted in a new and elegant type now cutting for this Society.

When a letter is cut off, its place should be supplied by a comma, as μ' αὐτῶν, my father; where the pronoun μῆς, mine, loses the σ; but if the comma be omitted, and the words written μαὐτῶν, according to the slovenly practice of modern writers, a Scholar would be at a loss whether to translate it my father or a mother: after any adventitious letter we should use an hyphen, as ἡ-ψυχή, her soul; ἁπ-τῶν, the apostle, as the French write y a t-il, where the t is inserted for euphony sake. If it be omitted in “αὐτῶν, our father, and written αὐτῶν, a learner will translate it our serpent.” So αὐτῶν, our sheep, αὐτῶν, our ship; αὐτῶν, our disgrace, αὐτῶν, our chains; αὐτῶν, in the place, or their place; αὐτῶν, the place, &c. &c.

It

word, as ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν, in the kingdom of Ireland; ὡς ἦλθον, they went. It would be of great service, and would facilitate much the reading of the language, if some system were adopted by which the pronunciation of these letters could be rendered more certain.

It is recommended by Donlevy to place the letter h before ç and τ in the beginning of a word, where in their aspirate form they are entirely silent, as τO hτOJl, thy will; τO hçujl, thine eye, which are pronounced hoJl and huJl; this, though not now practised, would be very useful in writing, and frequently occurs in old MSS.*

Where the Irish write amajl, as in ɲɟamajl, kingly; çɛɲamajl, manly; the Scots and Manx cut off the first syllable, and write ɲɟajl, çɛɲajl, or ɲɟujl, çɛujl; this, I think, improves the WRITTEN language, and though we find no authority for it in Irish MSS, I would advise the abstract term, ajl or ujl to be adopted in PROSE; amajl, or amujl, being commonly pronounced as one syllable. It is the root of the Latin terminations, alis and abilis,† which last, I am pretty certain,

was

* In the book of Lecan, fol. 10, col. 1, we find Ó çOJH amac̄, thenceforward, written Ó hçOJH amac̄.

† B and m are commutable in many words in various languages, then abilis is the same as amilis; the Latins have retained the letter m in similis, which is derived from çamajl, (samail) like; quasi, çO amajl.

was anciently pronounced avilis or avil, as the Irish sometimes pronounce their amóil. In this opinion I am the more firm, as the Italians often write avole, or evole, as in amichevole, friendly.

Nouns ending in ac, generally form their genitives in ajc, but the Scotch more simply write ajc, retaining the radical c, by which, I believe, the pronunciation is not altered. This is, I think, the best mode of orthography, for which we have the authority of several MSS, particularly the Book of Lecan, as may be seen by the following extracts :

Clann bechajch. p. 10, c. 2.

batan tñ mñ fup Humam m tan fm,
jdon, luğajð allatac acas Dñm dopmmar , fenačajñ luğdeach allatajch. Fol.
167, c. 1.

Fa mañð Cymčan mac fjadajch. Fol. 167.
c. 3.

In Gilla Kevin's poem. Fol. 261, c. 1.

Ʒaejðeal ƷlaƷ ó taio Ʒaejðl Mac fjdèn Njúl neicmájch

Ro bo thpēn flar h fōjn
Nēl mac fējnufa farsajch.*

Again, ch is used in the plural, and in verbs, for gh. Ex. gr.

Romānajch. Romans, Fol. 150, c. 4.

Ʒaetōel Ʒlaf aʒm in fhhj fa Ʒlaf a aʒm 'f a etōjch.†

Fol. 271, c. 1.

Ʒōjch na lojnʒi Ʒar lep
Dj tancatar mjc ʒjledō.

Fol. 12, c. 2.

Ro

* Fenius Farsy, i. e. Fenius the Persian; so Selman Farsi, i. e. the Persian, vide Ebn Haukul's Oriental Geography, translated by Sir Wm. Ouseley. Lond. 4to. 1800. p. 117.

† Keting and others assert that the Gaedhal, or Gadelus, obtained the epithet of Glas, or Green, from the green spot on his neck, occasioned by the bite of a serpent, which Moses cured; but Gilla Kevin in the passage here cited, with more probability, says, that he took that epithet from his green dress and armour.

Ro chuyndech Eoghan a iughean fonn tpeirech in airdé) fhu. Fol. 167, c. 2.

In fact, such examples occur in every page of the book; the following examples from a very ancient copy of the Festlige Dlenzuyk, or Festilogy of Aengus, will, I trust, cause this mode of inflection to be generally made use of:*

Mairena man Mucceinte
Cona chleir casn claudaich
Cruic af nunnu nindio Laidceann mac bairé bannaich.

12th January.

fo fhuich ceud Póil Dhrítoil Ino aunchuigeo cneolaich
h) feil ino fhuir chuympich Teolh tnuin tneonaich.

24th February.

The

* The only objection that I can find against adopting it, and which is no trifling one, is, that in several parts of Munster the z is pronounced full in many words, as fleiscas, bodas, aics, &c. which in other parts
of

The last subject to which I shall draw the attention of our grammarians, is the construction of such comparitives as  $\tau\upsilon\beta\iota\tau\eta$ , blacker;  $\xi\lambda\alpha\gamma\tau\eta$ , more green, &c. in the following extracts from an old vellum MSS, written in the fourteenth century, in the possession of Mr. Edward O'Reilly, treasurer of this Society.

Thus, in describing the wife of Eohy Airev :

( $\text{Eo}\acute{\epsilon}\alpha\delta\ \text{A}\eta\eta\epsilon\eta$ )

“ $\text{ba}\ \xi\lambda\eta\tau\eta\ \gamma\eta\acute{\epsilon}\tau\omicron\ \eta'\omicron\epsilon\eta\ \alpha\gamma\delta\acute{\epsilon}\ \acute{\epsilon}\acute{\epsilon}\tau\alpha\eta$
 $\alpha\ \delta\acute{\eta}\ \lambda\alpha\eta\eta$ ,  $\text{ba}\ \tau\epsilon\eta\eta\tau\eta\ \gamma\eta\alpha\eta\ \gamma\lambda\epsilon\gamma\beta\epsilon\ \acute{\epsilon}\acute{\epsilon}\tau\alpha\eta$
 $\alpha\ \delta\acute{\eta}\ \xi\mu\alpha\delta$ ,  $\text{ba}\ \xi\lambda\alpha\gamma\tau\eta\ \gamma\eta\eta\ \text{bu}\zeta\alpha\eta\ \acute{\epsilon}\acute{\epsilon}\tau\alpha\eta$ $\alpha\ \delta\acute{\eta}\ \gamma\acute{\upsilon}\lambda\upsilon$ ,” &c.

i. e. Whiter than the snow of one night was either of her two hands, more red than the berry of the mountain her two cheeks, greener than hyacinths were her two eyes.

In

of Ireland are pronounced  $\gamma\lambda\epsilon\gamma\alpha\eta\acute{\xi}$ ,  $\text{bo}\delta\alpha\eta\acute{\xi}$ ,  $\alpha\gamma\tau\eta\acute{\xi}$ , and which in Scotland are written  $\gamma\lambda\epsilon\gamma\alpha\eta\acute{\epsilon}$ ,  $\text{bo}\delta\alpha\eta\acute{\epsilon}$ ; the  $\xi$  then may sometimes be radical.

In the description of Conall Carnach :

Տիլէրն քնէ՛տա շէ՛տար ա ծա ջնուծ յի ծարա
 քէ՛տ, յի քէ՛տ ալե երեւ-ժայրճէրն զյան զլեյծե, Կ ճլայրճէրն եւջա յի ծարա զսլ ծօ, Կ ծայծյէրն ծրայրնու ծայր յի շփսլ ելե, &c.—Blacker than the thick'ning clouds was the other eye.

Describing the Drui or Magus, of Conaire Mór :

Գյոյրնէրն շանա՛կ զլեյծե շա՛կ քյոյնա քաքաք շրյա նա շենԾ.

So, քայրնէրն, զլէրնէրն, շրայրնէրն, լեյրնէրն, շայրնէրն, &c.

I shall conclude with a few remarks on our Manuscripts, the obscurity of which is an obstacle to the research of almost every Irish Scholar. But the chief difficulty of reading them, in my opinion, arises from a want of skill in the language; for a MSS, however crowded with contractions, will easily be read by a good Scholar. The oldest MSS have the least of these contractions, containing such only as are common in the first printed books. The Saxon MSS have all the Irish contractions ;

tractions; and, indeed, Bede, who from the early age in which he flourished, must be good authority for the assertion, says, that the Saxons took their alphabet from the Irish. Let any one look into Astle, on the Origin and Progress of Alphabetic writing, the Spectacle de le Nature, and the early printed Classics, and he will be convinced that the small alphabet used in early ages all through Europe, was borrowed from the Irish :

Ńac̃, is sometimes written for cãc̃.

Can, ceñ, cññ, for çan.

Occuf, ocuf, accus, occaſ, for acas or açuſ.

Dono, dno, dññ, dan, dna, for don, then.

Doejne, for dañne, men.

Ńjōce, for oñōce, night.

bhuajm, buajt, buajññ, &c. for uajm, uajt, uajññ.

Occo, for aca,

Uoj, uaj, boj, buj, baj, for bj.

Oe, for ae, as coel, doel, foer.

beof, for foſ.

Jñ, the, and jñd, which is now written an, but pronounced jñ.

Chc, for ç, as uécdañ, çñadúccat̃, for uçdañ, çñadúçat̃.

Doſ,

Δοϛ, ροϛ, ηοϛ, for τσ.

Ρο, ρα, for βα, was.

ϸϣΊ, for ζῖ-bΊ.

ἰ, in, and ηῖ, now, written α. <sup>1</sup>

The common contraction (7) in MSS to express the copulative conjunction, et, and, αϸαϛ, is no other than the Hebrew vau, ך, and the Persian waw, which both signify and.

It is probable that the Irish sometimes wrote from right to left; in many MSS I have seen ϣῖηῖτ, written τῖηῖϣ. This word is used at the end of a treatise for FINIS, ϸῖῖΊ, ϸῖῖῖῖῖῖ. END.

Δ, ζ, η, in MSS on medicine, signifies “of each article,” “ana.” Δο ζαΊ ηῖ.

ῖ, for αΊτ, but, it is the sed of Latin MSS.

ῖ<sup>α</sup>, stands for αῖα, that is α αῖα α, α on α.

η, for τῖῖῖῖ, quasi, a fallen or inverted η, τῖῖῖ η.

96, that is, ηαῖ and ϣῖ, for Νῖῖῖῖῖ, a proper name.

γ is written for ηῖ; this is the Greek contraction of ui.

Tables of these contractions, however, will, in a few years, be no longer necessary ; many learned men will soon give to the public the latent treasures of our MSS, and clear the path to the attainment of our language.

FINIS.

ADVICE TO A PRINCE, BY THADDY MAC BRODY, OR MAC BRODIN, SON OF DARY; BEING THE INAUGURATION ODE
OF DONACH O'BRIEN,
FOURTH EARL OF THOMOND, WHEN ELECTED PRINCE OF HIS NATION, ACCORDING TO ANCIENT IRISH USAGE;

WITH AN ENGLISH TRANSLATION IN VERSE, DEDICATED TO THE
RT. HON. THE EARL OF HUNTINGDON AND OF MOIRA.
AND A LATIN PROSE ONE, STRICTLY RENDERED WORD FOR WORD FROM THE ORIGINAL IRISH, WITH NOTES AND OBSERVATIONS,
THE LATTER INSCRIBED, BY PERMISSION,
TO THE
LEARNED PROVOST AND SENIOR FELLOWS
OF
TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.

By THEOPHILUS O'FLANAGAN, A. B.

SECRETARY TO THE Gaelic Society of Dublin.

Dublin.

PRINTED BY JOHN BARLOW, 29, BOLTON-STREET.
(PRINTER TO THE SOCIETY.)

1808.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

FRANCIS RAWDON HASTINGS,

EARL OF HUNTINGDON AND OF MOIRA,

&c. &c. &c.

MY LORD,

It is with deference, the most profound, I take the Liberty of dedicating the English Version of this Irish Poem to your Lordship. Your benign Mother, of dignified Memory, enabled me to give this curious Production to the World; and I could not resist the Wish of making this Acknowledgment of Gratitude to her great departed Spirit, as I have been fatally precluded from addressing it to herself. I am urged by another Motive too, of no small consideration. I have humbly presumed to think it of great Moment and

Importance,

Importance, to endeavour to attract the Attention of one of the most erudite, able, and accomplished hereditary Counsellors of the Crown;—of the attached and firm Friend of the August Heir-apparent to the Throne of the British Empire;—and of one whose own Veins teem with the high Blood of French and British Royalty,—to the Contemplation of ancient Irish Wisdom, exhibited in this interesting and instructive Poem. Should this be deemed precipitate or presumptuous, I entreat your Lordship's Forgiveness; and pray your Greatness of Soul to stand as my Advocate.

I have the Honour to be,
 With all Respect and Esteem,
 My Lord,
 Your Lordship's very humble,
 Obedient and devoted Servant,
 THEOPHILUS O'FLANAGAN,

P R O Ë M E.

THE subject of the following poem involves, within a small compass, a most comprehensive system of government. Its maxims, obviously simple, and derived from the pure unadulterated source of natural right, will still be found the condensed and approved experience of many successive ages. Its precepts have been sanctioned in the unaltered code of our ancient national laws, expounded and held forth, for many centuries, as the unerring rule of guidance, by our poetic, philosophic, and judicial seers and sages, to their several princes; and systematically arranged and digested by one of our greatest and wisest Monarchs, about the period of the dawning of the Gospel light in Ireland, as the directing star for the conduct of his beloved son, who aspired to be his successor, and who did succeed and wisely govern after him. I know not of any equal production in any other language, except these those admirable writings, the institution of Cyrus, from the masterly pen of Xenophon, and the Telemachus of the unrivaled Fenelon. These are, however, elaborate and diffusive works in prose, of incomparable stile and matter; but this fine effort of the venerable Mac Brodin, is (except in the language in which he writes) a singular instance of an extensive plan of rule, condensed within the limits of a short Essay, assuming the embellished harmony of poetic numbers, and professedly including within its narrow limits, the body and substance of all that had been delivered from the remotest time by his native predecessors, lawgivers, and antiquaries, on this most interesting and momentuous topic. It is not at all impossible that some similar tract may be found in the Shanscrit; for many of the Gentoo laws, (as appears from Mr. Halhead's translation) particularly those respecting timber trees, are very like our Brehon laws of the same description; and the profound and indefatigable researches of the learned General Vallancy, prove beyond all question, an intimate connexion to have subsisted, at a remote period, between our ancestors of the Milesian or Gadelian colony, and the eastern nations. Sir William Jones, in his Asiatic Researches, has given a Latin translation of "Instructions for a " Prince,"

“Prince,” from the Persic ; which, upon collation, will be found far short in style, matter, manner, and maxim of this fine Irish composition.

It is a fact, universally acknowledged, that the most ancient historical accounts, and legal institutions of the earliest associations of men, were committed to the sacred and enchanting custody of versification. And what more likely to give permanent stability to human institutions, so perishable and prone to change ? The fascinating charms of poetic harmony, expanding the mind with a holy enthusiasm, transfuse into the human breast, as it were, a kind of divine inspiration ; and by kindly indulging imagination and gratifying fancy, they arrest the memory with gently soothing wile, and engage in their willing service every generous sympathy. They convey a deathless perpetuity to the approved maxims of wisdom and experience, and consecrate high deeds of worth to everlasting fame.

If, then, amongst the most ancient literary monuments of a nation, there be found historical and legal tracts detailed in verse, it is a proof, incontrovertible, of legitimate claim to early and remote civilization ; so far from being an argument of savagery savagery or barbarism, than which nothing can be more foreign or contradictory to the refinements of poetry, which is chiefly conversant with the finest feelings and affections of human sentiment.

In this respect, Ireland is certainly, if not singularly remarkable. Among the shattered fragments of her oldest literary monuments, which have escaped the consuming ravages of time, and the more destructive rage of intestine wars and revolutions, the instances of historical and genealogical poetry are numerous, beyond all comparison with the records of any other nation on the globe, of which we have acquired any competent knowledge. Amidst the relics even of the great code of national laws, pre-eminently denominated SĒNECAF 9101, or Great Antiquity, and sanctified by the appellation of 61E1E NĒ11E0, or supreme judgments, I have found tracts of most important concern, (among others, those involving the right of landed property and hereditary succession,) arrayed in that garb which gives best assurance of eternity, the glowing guise of harmonious versification. The number of didactic essays of regal instruction in the Irish language, are many, both in prose and verse. The doctrine and maxims comprised in these compositions

compositions have become proverbially familiar in the ordinary conversation of a people habituated to them for many successive ages. They are transmitted from generation to generation, by imperceptible tradition; and thus habitually interwoven with thought and expression, they have influenced language, manners and customs; impressing character of a distinctive cast from that of surrounding nations. For such distinction the Irish have been peculiarly conspicuous for several centuries. The brief but comprehensive instructions, moral and judicial, of their philosophic sages, excited attention, enlarged the understanding, and allured to a practical exercise of all the social virtues. To the still remaining effects of this admirable discipline, combined perhaps with physical causes, may be attributed that quickness of apprehension, lively ingenuity and eager curiosity for intelligence and information, which yet characterise such as are unattainted by foreign corruption of this generous, affectionate, pious and virtuous people. I have frequently heard, with secret feeling of condolence, some of the finest precepts of our ancient morality and jurisprudence, unwittingly expressed, but faithfully applied by the innocent, unadulterated intelligence of traditional instruction, unconscious of the source of information.

tion. Thus, traditional wisdom, becoming a kind of natural instinct, confirms the fundamental maxim of oldest Irish law, “Perpetual each primitive ordinance of every nation.” Síni zaé fen dlíge zaéa cniéé—meaning that natural right is ever unalterable. But this maxim was framed without the most distant consideration of foreign interference. Its injunction is of no longer effect, except in soothing the regret of the uncorrupted native, or generously sympathizing foreigner. Our Fileas were men well informed in every liberal art and science known in their times; whose wisdom was always exercised in promoting the prosperity of their country. They were poets by name, but philosophers in doctrine and practice, insomuch, that the single appellation of Filea, communicates the reciprocal notion of philosopher and poet; and their maxims have been even quoted like the most authoritative judicial decisions, or sacred and authentic doctrines of law.

Nor is this so much to be wondered at, if we consider the description of persons, who were from time immemorial the framers, guardians and expounders of our ancient jurisprudence. The Danans, who inhabited Ireland previous to the time of the invasion.

invasion of the Gadelians, are said to have been well acquainted with letters; and the memory of some of their kings, poets and poetesses, or female philosophers, of highest repute for wisdom and learning, is still preserved with reverential regard in some of our old manuscripts of the best authority. Of these the monarchs Dagad, Ogamon, and Dalbœth, who flourished between the periods of 2804 and 2884 of the world; and Brig, or Brigid, daughter of king Dagad; Carbry, the brother of king Dalbœth; Edina, his mother; and Danana, who is reputed to have been both his daughter and wife, are most particularly noticed. We have already observed that prince Amergin was poetic philosopher and judicial sage to his brethren, the sons of Milesius, at the time and after the Gadelian expedition from Spain to Ireland; and numerous were the princes and dignified nobles, who followed him in that high office, through a long revolution of succeeding centuries. To give some brief account of the most celebrated of these, may not appear foreign to our purpose, especially as they are ever and anon referred to as the standing pillars and original founders; and from time to time, the authorized improvers of our institution of great antiquity, (from Senéas Gbóin;) the venerable rable and sacred deposit—the unalterable code of our national laws. It would appear that Amergin's own apophthegm, “I ordain, that decision abide “ with the intelligent, and execution with princes,”

“Egna la b'eglaj aTja, “Alcaj rebta la flajeb;”

Continued in force for several ages after him; for we find that the poets or judges dispensed the laws of their own authority, with little interruption from any other power of the state, until a short period before the Christian Æra. It is true, Ollamh Fodla, about the year A. M. 3240, instituted the triennial assembly of Tara, for enacting and promulgating, perpetuating and preserving laws; founded a college to dignify the poetic institution, which endured for many ages before the birth of Christ, and produced many sages eminent for their knowledge and exertions for the improvement of the useful arts and sciences known in their time; particularly jurisprudence. Among those most celebrated are ranked Roigny Roscach, or the extemporaneous poet, son of Hugony the great, king of Ireland, A. M. 3619; Achy, the son of Luchta, king of Munster; Sencha, and his son Fachtna, Fachtna, and his daughter Briga; Moghdorn, daughter of Modha; and Ethnea, daughter of Amalgad, all of royal descent, whose names, besides many others, are to be met with in our manuscripts at the head of the several treatises, which they composed, and for which they procured the sanction of authoritative laws. Here we must not omit taking notice that as Greece and Egypt could boast of Arpasia, and other women of extraordinary wisdom, so ancient Ireland can plume herself upon Brigid, Danana, Mogdhorn, Briga, and Ethnea, whose names embellish literary tracts, which maintain existence through an immensity of time, and contain doctrines once held nearly equivalent to precepts of divine authority. Such are the lights that burst through the gloom of ages, illuminating the darkness which surrounds them. The dense and pithy apophthegms, maxims, and aphorisms of these and other sages, occasionally digested and explained, continued the sovereign rule of right until about the time of the incarnation, when Achy Aremh swayed the sceptre of Ireland, and the celebrated Conor, son of Nessa, (so called from his mother) was king of Ulster. This prince whose father was Fachtna Fathach, or Fuchtna the Philosopher, king of Ireland, was very actively industrious in giving giving stability to the existing laws, by having them compiled and digested into written volumes, and deposited in the public Archives; and his favourite poets, Forchern, Neid, and Athairney of Howth, are mentioned as the joint labourers in this arduous task of arrangement and compilation. They also drew up a book, entitled the "Precepts of the Poets," (Urraicecht na n-Éigse,) chiefly attributed to Forchern, Forcert, or Fercart, containing elements of grammar, and rules for every kind of poetical composition. Several copies of this, in manuscript, are still existing. Moran, the instructor and supreme judge of Feradach, the Just, was himself the son of king Carbry, the popular usurper, who was raised to the throne by the Attacotic, or Plebeian rebellion, in the beginning of the first century. On account of the odium attached to his Father's usurpation, Moran is better known, in our manuscripts, by the name of Moran the son of Maen, the daughter of the king of Leinster, who was his mother. He, from conscientious and equitable motives, declined the sovereignty, and was principally instrumental in the restoration of the rightful prince; a rare instance of virtuous forbearance at any period, and peculiarly remarkable in heathen times. But, anterior to the propagation of the Gospel son-in-law of king Cormac, and the confidential associate of all his studies, councils, and achievements. He is highly celebrated for jurisprudence and poetry, insomuch that he obtained the estimation of a prophet, and some of the dissertations which he wrote in his native language were extant about 120 years ago, in Mr. O'Flaherty's time, and perhaps are still recoverable. The fame of his great military exploits have afforded vast scope for exercise of talent, and a wide display of panegyric to the poets of succeeding ages. His grand-father Thaddy, was of the Druidical order, and instructed him in every liberal art and science prevalent in the age in which he lived. His son Oisin (the Ossian of Mr. M'Pherson) was famous in arts and arms; and another of his sons, Fergus Finbheoil, or fair-lips, figuratively meaning, of sublime diction, has been emphatically stiled the "philosophic poet of pointed expression,"—“Ἰνι γῆε γάταε γοεαί-ἔῆρ.” Fithal, and his son Flathri, were successively Cormac's supreme judges, the former of whom was his instructor from youth to maturity; and the merited celebrity of the pupil, reflects a splendour of fame on the great and respectable capacity of the master. But Fithal and Flathri have left monuments of their own talents talents to perpetuate their memory ; some of which have endured through many a miserable national vicissitude to this day.

Such, with numberless others, were the dignified founders, improvers and preservers of the ancient laws and literature; poetry and philosophy of Ireland; previously to the introduction and acceptance of the revealed wisdom. From such exalted guides and instructors, legislators and guardians in the walks of science, what high cultivation must we not expect? What elevation of sentiment, majesty of thought, refinement of expression, and cultivation of moral and social civility, inaccessible to all grovelling baseness or mean and corrupt depravity, may we not hold in prospect?—Nor shall our hopes be disappointed. As musical melody, by its enchanting influence, kindly attempers gentle and generous feelings; so the combined charms of science and poetic harmony elevate the soul for the reception of every principle that is grand, noble and virtuous. Such was the disposition of the informed mind, in Ireland, when our venerated Apostle, SUCAT, dignified with the title of PATRICIUS, that is, a noble of Rome, came on the holy mission of propagating the Gospel in this enlightened land, towards

C

towards the middle of the fifth century. Here the word of God obtained a reception more easy and expeditious, more eager and zealous, than in almost any other country of the world: It soon shone, and continued long to shine, like the splendour of the sun, in all its fervour and brilliancy; some bright scintillations of which, though enveloped in mist and darkness, it is fondly hoped, are still remaining. The inspired and convincing doctrines of a religion divinely pure and unadulterated by any dregs of earthly consideration, (yet capable, if faithfully practised, of approximating the joys of earth to those of paradise,) were embraced with ardent eagerness and generous enthusiasm, by minds already well prepared for the reception of its sacred truths; having been long habituated to deep reflexion, to abstract and moral contemplation.

The united dignity and wisdom of Ireland, convened in the august assembly of Temor, abolished whatever heathen worship they possessed, and solemnly accepted the faith of Christ; which, by their authority and example, was soon disseminated throughout the mass of the national population. On this occasion, the Monarch's own chief in wisdom, Dubhthach, grand-son of Lughar, a Lagenian prince, prince, is said to have first set the example, and to have bent the knee in obeisance to the holy missionary; and Jocelin tells us he afterwards exercised his talents in hymns of praise to the most high God, in place of celebrating, as before, the vain and transient glory of temporal princes.

The Christian dispensation being thus established, the literature of Ireland, hitherto peculiar and appropriate, underwent some material changes.— In the first instance, a select committee of nine, composed of the most intelligent princes and sages, among whom were St. Patrick himself and the aforesaid Dubhthach O'Lughair, were appointed to revise the national institutes. The first object of their zeal was to purge the old archives of all that regarded heathen worship; it being considered the surest method of making way for the truth of revelation, to abolish all traces of the hitherto prevailing superstition; and their revisal was confirmed by the sanction of the national council. On this occasion, we are told, that near two hundred volumes of our ancient literature were condemned and committed to the flames, to the eternal, I will not say whether just, regret of posterity. Indeed if this fact were not supported by the concurrent testimony of all the ancients, I should reject it altogether. The next change, whether immediate or gradual, obtained in the arrangement and form, but not in the number or power of our elements of literature or alphabetical characters. Before the introduction of Greek and Roman literature, with the religion of the Gospel, our invariable traditions maintain that our literature was of eastern origin. These traditions are irresistibly supported and confirmed, at this day, by the profound researches of the indefatigable investigator of our antiquity, the learned and venerable General Vallancey. His erudite lucubrations, throughout, establish irrefragable evidence of the truth of our domestic accounts, however obscured the latter may appear from the glosses, derangements, mutilations, and other accidents of distracted and fluctuating time. Previously to the middle of the fifth century, then, our ancestors wrote and read from right to left according to the eastern usage. Our ancient alphabet consisted of but sixteen letters, which continue in use without any necessary alteration or addition to this day. Here there is a marked coincidence between our alphabet and that said to have been brought into Greece from Egypt by Cadmus, another incontestible proof of its eastern origin. The primitive arrangement

and

and characteristic forms of these letters, as well as the practice of writing from right to left, were changed in conformity to the modes in use with those languages, through whose medium the revealed dispensation was communicated. The original appellative names and articulate powers, however, remained unaltered; as did the general system of literature, and its philosophic guardians, except in the substitution of the Christian for the heathen priesthood. If Druidism, therefore, (as some will have it,) previously obtained, the modern antiquary has nothing to lament, but what, if preserved, would not materially add to his knowledge, and might disappoint the eagerness of his curiosity; at best only the dark and mysterious maxims of a blind and misleading superstition. As to the solar and theistical adoration which prevailed in this island before Christianity, there are sufficient documents still remaining to satisfy all rational investigation on that interesting subject. I would gladly obviate the laudable regret for losses of more serious consideration; but unhappily this is widely beyond the limits of my means and circumstances. Our history and poetry our laws and philosophy, have been deranged and dispersed, shattered and mutilated, and nearly consigned to contemptuous neglect and annihilating oblivion.

oblivion. Nothing now remains of our native literature, but the shattered, yet interesting, fragments of the wisdom of a singularly reflecting people. Thus the venerable fabric of our ancient dignity has been hurled down a dreadful precipice, by the storms of adversity; and the only consolation left, is, that it appears majestic even in ruin!—

From Amergin to Dubhthach O'Lughair, the judicial and philosophic, the poetic and historic character centered, with very little deviation, in the same person. The exercise of these functions were often arbitrary, and as the best regulated human ordinances are subject to abuse, disorders consequently crept in, which, from time to time, required the curb of salutary restraint and regulation. Hence the wise reformations by Ollamh Fodhla, Feradach the Just, Conor Mac Nessa, King Cormac, and, at length, the revisal in the time of St. Patrick. From this period to the reign of Aedh, son of Anniry, we read not of any other regulation of the poetic profession. At this time, however, towards the end of the sixth century, the illustrious St. Colum Kill, who declined, for the retirement of a cloister, the Irish crown to which he was entitled; came from his monastery of Hy, to assist with his counsel and influence, to adjust the differences which then subsisted between the reigning prince and the poets and their abettors. The monarch was vehement in his desire to annihilate the order altogether, but the Saint, who was himself eminent in the art, was equally zealous for its preservation under due controul, and he succeeded. In short, Ireland is acknowledged by all the old historians worthy of credit, to have been the school of the west, and to have furnished England, France, and Germany, with able teachers, from the fifth to the close of the eighth century, when it was disturbed by the predatory and desolating incursions of the Northern Rovers, who continued to harrass and confuse this country for upwards of two centuries, a period of disturbance which nearly annihilated its civility. It is even confidently asserted, that many of our valuable manuscripts had been taken, during this interval, to Denmark; nor is the disappointment of the liberal Dr. Warner a sufficient proof that none of our records do exist in the archives of Denmark to this day. Those who searched for them might have been too indolent, too careless, and, in all probability, utterly incapable of distinguishing an Irish from any other old manuscript. I was acquainted, some years ago, with
with

with

with Mr. Thorkelin, an Icelandic Gentleman, professor of history and Icelandic antiquities to his Danish majesty, in the royal college of Copenhagen. He sojourned in Dublin for some time on literary research. I translated for his use, some abstracts from our annals relative to the transactions of the Danes in Ireland. He confidently assured me, that he knew several families in his native country, who were in possession of old books of history and genealogy in Irish, and old Irish poems, over which they frequently spent their hours of amusement, and made Irish the language of their domestic conversation. His manner of accounting for the fact should be mentioned:—He said that some Irish families must have retired to Iceland from internal commotions in their native country at a remote period, and still continue to cherish its memory. I was present when General Vallancey gave Mr. Thorkelin a Caiè of old vellum, containing a law tract, to guide him in an intended search for Irish manuscripts in the archives of Denmark on his return, but no result has ensued. We have a wonderful instance of the preservation of some fragments of our ancient poetry, without the assistance of letters, in the traditional memory of the Albanian Scots, the descendants of a colony sent from Ireland in the sixth century, with whom our language has long ceased to be written till lately, and even now but corruptly. I mean the fragments of Oisín, the feigned translation of which gave celebrity to Mr. M'Pherson, whose visionary history, built upon them, I consider now as utterly exploded. We have many written and some traditional remains of poems attributed to Oisín, and the preservation of any fragments of them, in the traditional memory of the Albanian Scots still inhabiting the highlands, is an obvious proof, surpassing volumes of conjecture, of their very great antiquity. But this makes not by any means for M'Pherson's airy system, as the original migration from Ireland, and the introduction of some of its old poetry into modern Scotland or Albany is, (and always has been by the general mass,) universally acknowledged by the well informed of his countrymen, to the utter rejection of his fabricated story. For the credit of his talents, however perverse their application, we should not omit observing, that, from scanty and disfigured original materials, he has compiled and left to posterity a lasting monument of his genius. Let not this tribute of praise however, encourage the prejudiced of that nation, to palm, on an enlightened age, the detected forgeries of a modern corrupt dialect, as the admirable effusions of ancient genius. No longer let the erudition and respectable talents of a Stuart* be exerted to give stability to barbarism; while the fair field of investigating the lucid beauties, the sublime force, and the accurate and improved elegance of the venerable mother tongue court the acquaintance of his critical contemplations. Away with the imposture that deluded the genius of Blair†, that led astray the researches of Whitaker‡, and has long imposed on the learned world as “Tales of Other Times,”—the modern fictions of Albano-Scotic fabrication. I have been lately informed that some private correspondence of Mr. McPherson himself, has been communicated to the Gaelic Society of the Highlands, acknowledging the imposition of this English publication, with the attempt of translating it into modern Erse.
the

The

* Author of a Gaelic Grammar, the best and most judicious attempt that has yet appeared in print, of a philological system appropriated to this dialect. A thorough knowledge of the genuine Irish language, to which he himself incidentally gives preference, would compleat this production.

† Author of the Lectures on Elocution.

‡ Author of the History of Manchester.

The author of this Advice to a Prince, was born about thirty years before the close of the sixteenth, and lived till about the middle of the seventeenth century. He possessed a fine appenage, as the hereditary PHILIPPIC BARD of Thomond, (even in the decline of such establishments.)—the castle of Dunogan, and its appurtenances, in the barony of Ibrican, in the west of the county of Clare. But for this he was assassinated by a marauding soldier of Cromwell's army, who must himself have been a native Irishman, as in the act of treacherously hurling him down a precipice, which caused his destruction, he, with savage exultation exclaimed, Ἐβλάτο ἡαἰμῖν ἀνοήτῃ, ἔβην βίτῃ. “Say your verses now, little man.” Mac Dary was a very elegant and elaborate poet. His original efforts were for the regulation of the conduct of Donogh or Dunchad O'Brien, fourth Earl of Thomond. This was in conformity with the ancient usage of Ireland, which entitled the bard to advise his prince in the same manner that the oldest Mandarin of China is at liberty to admonish the Emperor. Our ancient philosophic poets had ever the same privilege, and always, in senate and assembly, held place at the right hand of the King. Mac Brodin was in this situation when the bardic establishment was in declining

wane. Donogh O'Brien was bred at the courts of Elizabeth, and of James the first, and introduced and enforced their ordinances in Thomond; but Mac Brodin still continued to give him the usual advice of antiquity. This was, that upon the elective appointment of every king, prince, or chieftain, the authorised laureat should pronounce an ode of advice before him, on his being enthroned. This was an ordinance of ancient law as will be seen in the notes. Mac Dary, as he is called from his father, wrote many other poems, all still extant, beside those addressed to the Earl of Thomond. He wrote a censure upon a poem of Torna Eiges, the philosophic bard of king Niall the great, which brought upon him an attack from the numerous body of the northern poets; but he came off triumphant, by his singular talent, in the contest. All these poems are preserved, and as including a considerable portion of authority from the obscured or lost documents of Irish history, are extremely valuable. Mac Dary was a completely accomplished master of all the ancient various learning, poetry, and jurisprudence of his country.

I have been enabled to give this singular production to the world, by the munificence of the late dignified

dignified Countess of Moira. Several incorrect copies of it are current through Ireland: but that which I give is the only correct one I have ever seen. It is contained, among other valuable poems, in a manuscript folio, on paper, bound in Turkey leather, and gilt on the edges. This compilation was made by the Rev. Mr. O'Gara, a poor Friar of the Franciscan order, who was forced from innocent retirement to fly his native country, (Galway,) in the woeful period of the barbarous ravages and monstrous massacres of Cromwell's soldiery. The Irish who were providentially able to fly, at this calamitous period, took with them, (particularly the clergy), what they could of their literature; and this ingenious and ingenuous innocent amused himself, during the years of his exile, in collecting and transcribing Irish poems in the several Cœnobia of the Low Countries. Upon his death, it seems, this valuable volume, came into the family of O'Daly of Dunsandel, who were themselves formerly eminent in Irish literature. At the sale of the library of the Right Hon. Denis Daly, the late eminent Irish Senator, chief of that house, it was set up to auction. Lady Moira's chaplain, (the Rev. Mr. Berwick,) and myself were the only bidders. When Mr. Berwick discovered my name, he declined bidding, and it became my purchase; but the book not being called for by me the next day, as I took ill, Mr. Mercier, the clerk of the sale, took it to Lady Moira, to shew deserved and respectful attention. I had the high honour of being previously introduced to her ladyship: and when I was next enabled to take the opportunity of doing myself the honour of a visit to her, she was benignly pleased to present it to me, kindly saying that "I could make the best use of it" I retain this valuable Relic, and shall, I hope, consecrate it to the dignified shade of her benevolence. It was by the kind favour of my much respected and esteemed friend, the Chevalier Thomas O'German, a great promoter and preserver of Irish History and Literature, that I had the happiness of this introduction.

ADVICE TO A PRINCE.

HOW serious is the task, how vastly great,
To teach a prince his duty to the state !
'Tis his each blessing on the land to bring,
And, (what becomes a good and patriot king )
To draw his glory from such order'd sway, 5
That all may love and chearfully obey :—
To raise his country to a prosp'rous height,
Or plunge it deep in dark, disastrous night !
Since by his deeds the state must rise or fall,
He should incline to hear th' advice of all ;— 10
Nor wisdoms's awful maxims dare to break,
Th' unerring rules of sacred truth I speak.*
A king, as many a sage hath truly told,†
If he his pow'r by tyranny uphold,

Must

* Truth consecrated by the successive improving wisdom of ages, in the national code.

† All his philosophic predecessors in regal advices.

Must blast the public welfare and his own ;— 15

He sacrifices not himself alone!—

Death, want, and famine, ghastly stalk around,

And rapine's voice is heard with horrid sound,*

Plague,

* In the old law tracts is found the following fragment of a lyric inauguration ode, always sung to the Harp, and played before the ancient Irish Princes, upon their enthronement :—

2ltaio seét maónaife
 For sellatò gae caé nís ;
 Senaio do fodaò aq an amlife,
 Gan fín, gan dlí.
 Dje aine, mje maò tar éirt ;
 Maòim caàa fann ;
 N'úna in a fhlaife ;
 Djece m-bleéta
 Mleò ghefa ;
 Seol n-éta ;
 Ite seét m-beo éasuidle ann fo
 For oína gae caé Rís.

“ There are seven witnesses for exposing the falsehood
 “ of every king :—1. To force a senate out of their house “ of assembly, contrary to justice and law—2. To act the “ deed of over-straining justice—3. Defeat in battle “ against him—4. Famine in his reign—5. Failure of “ milk in kine—6. Blight of fruit—7. Blight of corn.
 “ Here are seven vivid lights to expose the unworthiness
 “ of every king.” This is a singular admonition, faithfully copied, but finely enlarged upon by the profound Mac Brodin.

Plague, war and blood, disaster and defeat,
 The rage of elements, the crush of fate,           20
 The bane of anarchy,—destructive train,— Sprung from the monarch's crimes, assume th' imperial rein.

Not so the King, who rules with lawful sway,
 No gloomy evil clouds his peaceful day!—
 Abundance spreads her joys, with copious hand, 25
 Throughout great Feilim's fair-inclining land :*—
 Propitious plenty spreads her wide domain,
 Thro' Erin's fields, when rightful princes reign.
 The land teems wealth, and all the harbours round
 Productive prove ; with fish the streams abound : 30
 The seasons genial fruit abundant bring ;—
 May all these blessings fair await my king !—
 And num'rous fleets, if so his will ordain,
 With richest treasures, crouding from the main.

E

Shall

* A poetic appellation given to Ireland, here taken for a delightful hill. Mac Dary was a correct geographer, and consequently well aware of the projection of Ireland. He calls it the "fair inclining hill of Feilim" poetically, as it was the sovereignty of Feilim the Lawgiver, who was its monarch in the beginning of the second century. He is celebrated as one of the wisest and most prosperous of our Kings, and emphatically stiled the LAWGIVER, from the excellence of his Institutions.

Shall fill his harbours,—for the fav’ring tides, 35
 Waft them in safety, where just rule abides.*
 This wish’d-for happiness, these blessings rare
 A great and mighty sovereign’s rule declare, }
 And shou’d be ev’ry monarch’s aim and care.— }
 Since, then, the welfare of the country lies 40
 Within his will, we must our prince advise,
 That

* It has been denied by flimsy writers, in English, that Ireland had any commerce formerly. King Cormac, Long Beard, who began his reign in the year of our Redemption, 254, mentions, in his advice to his son Car-bry of Liffey, that “valuable wares over sea;” Σπείτεται μὲν; are indispensably necessary to the dignity and prosperity of a monarch. Moran, the judge of the first century, has the same sentiment. Every scholar knows what Tacitus asserts in the life of his father-in-law, Agricola; and here his authority must be acknowledged irrefragable. He says, that the ports of Ireland were better known from commerce, and thro’ commercial men, than those of Britain. “Portus per commercia et negotiatores melius cogniti.” Sir Lawrence Parsons, now Earl of Rosse, in his erudite vindication of the will of the Right Hon. Henry Flood, has unequivocally proved, that Ireland was better known to the ancients than Britain; and has clearly demonstrated, from Herodotus, the truth of Irish History, as detailed in our own most ancient records. Herodotus states, that a colony of ΣΚΥΘΑΙ, or SCYTHIANS, inhabited the borders of the Red Sea. This is incontrovertible authentication of Irish History, as related by our own historians.

That he may walk in wisdom's sacred ways,
 Strengthen his pow'r, and gain immortal praise.
 And tho' each loyal subject counsel bring,—
 And to avoid misrule, instruct the king ; 45
 Yet 'tis alone the bard's peculiar claim,
 As 'tis his only joy—his only aim,—
 To draw th' attention of his monarch's ear,—
 The bard's advice regardful shou'd he hear.*
 'Tis the chief province of the poet sage, 50
 To guard his prince against inord'nate rage,
 Restrain his ire, protect him 'gainst all wrong,
 Beyond the bounds of right shou'd he prolong
 His erring step ; to stay his hasty course
 By eloquence divine, and wisdom's pow'rful force. 55
 Each sov'reign here, since time's remotest day,
 Retain'd a bard, who could in tuneful lay,
 Dispense wise precepts to direct the State,—
 The regal helm of pow'r to regulate.
 And as their bards and sages' sacred lore 60
 Avail'd our sov'reign princes heretofore,
 So may our present potentate from mine
 Derive advantage, nor to them resign,—
 But by the fame of equal judgment shine. }
 As

* This is an universal maxim in our ancient writings,

Այճե՞՞՞ օղան այսմ ՔԴՅ.

“A poetic sage is entitled to respect from a king.”

As Torna's* counsel wise, his royal ward, 65
 The mighty Niall, Ierne's sov'reign guard, Avail'd, so may my sapient lays Prevail for Clare's,—for Great O'Brien's praise.
 As royal Cormac's‡ sound instruction prov'd Successful to the son he dearly lov'd ; 70
 The

* Torna, emphatically stiled, Εἰρηστής, or the Intelligent, was the teacher and guardian from infancy of Niall the Great, surnamed of the Nine Hostages, who was king of Ireland towards the end of the fourth century of our æra. Torna's inauguration ode, upon the enthronement of his ward, is still extant in manuscript. It begins thus,

Ἐὰν μοι ἐβραβεύσῃ, ἄ Νέϊλλ νάϊη,
 “Take my counsel mighty Niall.”

The word NIALL is but one syllable. The diphthong ja which is peculiar to the Irish language, sounds like ea in year, fear, dear, &c. This Torna was married to Kævin, (Cæm-f)hinn,) daughter to Connall (εἰ-λουαῖτ,) of the swift steeds, king of (Munster) Munster, where his posterity inherited princely possessions. From such circumstances it can be evidently concluded, that our ancient poets were not merely rhyming or trivial bards, which is the affected consideration of them, by modern sciolists.

+ Donogh or Dunchad O'Brien, fourth Earl of Thomond, was pre-eminently stiled the “Great Earl.”

‡ King Cormac, Long-Beard; assumed the throne of Ireland in the middle of the third century, and had a long and prosperous reign. Like the Emperor Charles the fifth of Spain, he retired in old age, and wrote a treatise

The valiant Carbry, who from Liffey's stream
 That silent glides, assum'd his mighty name,
 And who for prosp'ring Achy's* blissful land,
 For ever on the wing of Fame shall stand ;
 So may my admonition useful prove,— 75
 So may it bless the royal prince I love.
 Such pow'r ascendant may my fervent strain
 O'er thy high mind and mighty spirit gain,

As

tise of instruction for his son Carbry, which is still preserved, and contains doctrine closely bordering on Christian purity. It is, in fact, an abstract of the law which directed and guided the sovereign. Little do the rulers of England know, that the origin of their jurisprudence is with us, not from the forests of Germany, as falsely asserted. This Cormac is considered one of the wisest monarchs of antiquity. An old poet gives the following character of him :—

Cormac bneiceim na m-bneice fíir,
 E do éiríac tacaic na Ríe;
 Ní fáigean úgdan is fearr 2lín ólígéib aeda Eirenn.

“Cormac, judge of judgments true; he wrote,
 “the advice to kings; no better author is found upon “the ancient laws of Ireland.” See Keting and Lynch, in Cormac's life.

*There were several Achaii or Achy's, Kings of Ireland; but the Achy here alluded to, was Achy Moy-medon, who reigned in the middle of the third century. He was father to Niall the Great, surnamed of the Nine Hostages.

As Fithil's* forceful voice o'er Cormac's soul
 Prevail'd, confessing Reason's fair controul, 80
 In Temor's† halls,—th' event successful prov'd,—
 Nor disobey'd the prince the sage he lov'd.
 May on thy soul the beam of counsel break
 From me,—nor ire deform thy crimson cheek, }
 But, placid, hear thy honor'd poet speak. 85 }
 As once in Croghan's halls great Conn‡ dismay'd
 Seeing the banners of the foe display'd,

And

* He is sufficiently spoken of in the Preface.

† The ancient residence of the kings of Ireland in the present county of Meath. In an old gloss, upon a law tract, the word is explained, τὸ ἀέριον ἄβησι, Collis amœnus, a delightful hill.

‡ Conn of the hundred battles, was king of Ireland in the second century. In his youth he had to maintain a very great contest with Eogan Mor, otherwise called Modha Nuadhat, king of Munster, who, in the first instance, by the help of some Spanish auxiliaries, forced him to an equal division of the kingdom. Eogan was married to a daughter of the king of Spain. His ambition led him to aspire to the Irish throne, and having pushed Conn to great difficulty, the latter was on the point of yielding; but Connall of Croghan, the reigning king of Connaught, and Kihro, his own laureat, urged him to try the fortune of a battle. It was fought on the plain of Lena, and the issue proved successful to Conn. The story is finely told in Irish, and has not escaped the notice of Mr. M'Pherson. Here indeed, he is not guilty

And num'rous hosts o'erspreading wide the plain ;—
 He thought his few cou'd not the fight maintain.
 Kiro his bard,—to perseverance fir'd,— 90
 The prince obey'd, by Wisdom's force inspir'd.
 The just Ferada* reign'd with prosp'rous sway,
 But Moran's matchless wisdom shew'd the way.

May

guilty of anachronism, but of historic falsehood. None of the Fians were in the battle, except Goll, son of Morni, and his adherents. He encountered the redoubted hero, Eogan, who subdued him, but his life was rescued by numbers of his tribe, who rushed upon the Momonian prince with their Javelins, to preserve their chief. Thus died the ROYAL HERO, as Goll himself called him, in desiring his protectors to let him down, as they had raised him on their spears. The appellation for king Conn in the original is, “the sappy branch,” meaning “the youthful hero.” 'Tis a familiar fine figure in Irish to compare youths to scions, men to trees, and old heroes to trees of ancient growth, expressed by the single Irish word, b]l̄c̄, for which there is no equivalent English expression.

* Of Feradach the Just, and his judicial sage Moran, there is mention made in the proëme. Moran, who was the son of Carbry Cat-head, the Attacot, or Plebeian usurper, was a wise man, and his father's judge. The offered succession he declined, and sent his son Neiri with an epistle, inviting and directing the rightful prince how to act. This tract, still preserved, is called Moran's will. It was written in the beginning of the Christian æra, and is now intelligible but to very few. For this there are two or three powerful reasons.

Moran

May like prosperity my lays attend, 95
 And wisely guide your councils to the end,—
 While from his rolling diction's force sublime,
 I draw chief matter of my humbler rhyme.
 As sov'reign Labhra, stil'd "of naval fame,"
 The brazen bulwark of his race and name, 100
 Triumph'd thro' Fercart's* bold, prophetic lays,
 So now may mine attain perennial praise.

May

Moran was acting contrary to the prevailing existing system. His son was to convey his mandate, and he must fear for his life as well as for his own and that of the prince; besides holding apprehension of success. The tract is in the obscure Fenian dialect of our language. It is magnificently grand and sublime in diction, and amazingly dense in precept. Mac Dary understood it well, as he here professes, and has given all its doctrine. A translation of it made by myself, some years ago, lies by me still. Moran's justice is so celebrated, that it is said the torques, or chain of gold, which he wore as the badge of his office, would expand round the neck of a true witness and contract, to his suffocation round the neck of a false one. The traditional memory of this is so well preserved to this day, that it is a common expression for a person asseverating absolute truth, to say, ṡabṡaṡi an ṡō or an ṡḡṡō ḡḡōṡaṡi ann. "I would swear by Moran's chain for it."—ṡabṡaṡi an ṡḡṡō ḡḡōṡaṡi ann. is universally understood through Ireland.

* Fercart lived in the beginning of the Christian æra. He was the laureat of king Labhra, emphatically stiled the Mariner. It is before observed, that our Laureats were were

May all the brilliant glory that e'er crown'd
 The sceptr'd kings of Lughad's* hall renown'd,
 On thee attend,—great heir of Borom's† line!—105
 May ev'ry blessing, high-born prince, be thine.

F

And

were men of dignity. This Fercart obtained his name from  $\chi\epsilon\pi$ , a man, and  $\sigma\epsilon\pi\tau\upsilon\zeta\alpha\omicron$ , to certify. This is further explained in an old manuscript by the words  $\chi\epsilon\pi \acute{\epsilon}\sigma\pi\acute{\upsilon}\zeta\alpha\omicron \eta\alpha \eta\text{-}\epsilon\lambda\alpha\omicron\eta\alpha$ , i. e. “The Rectifier of Science.” His Elementary Grammar of the Irish Language, (the oldest existing of any language,) is still extant in manuscript.

* There were several Lughads, Kings of Ireland. The Lughad here mentioned is Lughad, (or Lewis) Long-Hand, who instituted the Games and Assemblies of Taltin; renowned for many successive ages. He lived upwards of a thousand years before the Christian era, and was founder of the games and assemblies so famous in Irish History, called the “Assemblies of Naas.”

† Brian Boromhe, (or Boromha,) son of Kennedy, son of Lorcan, was the most renowned Christian Prince, who swayed the sceptre of Ireland. He subdued, with loss of his own, his son's, and grandson's life, the united host of the King of Leinster; of the Danes; of all his foreign and domestic foes, in the memorable battle of Clontarf, fought on Good Friday, the 25th of April, 1014. He was one of the many Alfreds of Ireland.

Considering

And since 'tis justly claim'd of me alone,
 By glorious deeds to fortify his throne,
 I'll teach the chief of Thal's* illustrious race,
 And to attain this end what path to trace ;— 110
 Beneath whose sway, indulgent, just, and free,
 Luxuriant fruitage crowns the bending tree.
 And tho' my destinies have not decreed
 My sovereign's w<sup>o</sup>r<sup>d</sup>ship,—as my honor'd meed,
 Yet as my royal lord my voice obeys, 115
 My duty urges these instructive lays,
 Since Dunchad, Borom's offspring, great O'Brien,
 Now powr'ful rules o'er Modha's† ancient line ;
Let

Considering his sphere of action, he was one of the greatest men that ever lived. A prince, a king, a leader, a philosopher, is a rare instance of human greatness,
 but of such greatness was he a very luminous instance.
 To finish his character, He was a Christian King.

* TAL was one of O'Brien's royal ancestors.

† Modha Nuadhat, of whom we spoke in a preceding note, was succeeded on the throne of Munster by his son Olioll Olum. This Prince, ordained by his will, that the direct descendants of his two sons Eogan Mor, the younger, and Cormac Cas, should reign alternately. This ordinance was strictly observed for several

Let not brave Fey's descent of princely race,
 Think their subjection to his rule disgrace. 120
 To wear the crown he has the legal claim,*—
 Of lineage royal—and of spotless fame,
 Victory constant leads his martial train,
 Plenty smiles upon the flow'ry plain,
 And tranquil peace adorns his blissful reign. 125 }
 Firm fortitude invigorates his mind,
 Unmov'd in what is just and wise design'd.

Thou

several successive ages. Fey, or Fiachadh Mullethan, was the son of Eogan, and from him descended the Mac Carthys, and other great families of Desmond or South Munster; while the O'Briens and Mac Namaras derive descent from Cormac Cas. To this the poet alludes, and endeavours to conciliate the southern chiefs, to acquiesce in the elevation of O'Brien, although it might not be his time to rise to the dignity.

* The "legal claim" was election; but such election was legally regulated. The person to be elevated to chieftain or principality must be of true royal or princely blood: "He must be the son of a prince, and the grandson of another:" buò mac flata acas buò na ar oifc. These are the words of the Law.

Thou mighty king of Lumnia's* fertile plain,
 Let not thy poet's warning voice be vain;
 Most bounteous hand † of all the world's domain. }
 O ne'er forgetful from him turn astray, 130
 From whom thou hold'st but delegated sway.
 Monarch, his dreadful might and pow'r attend,
 Before whose throne the nations trembling bend:
 To him resign thyself,—thy service whole,—
 Let him completely occupy thy soul: 135
 Forsake not ever, or the love, or fear,
 Of him who rules the universal sphere.
 The fear of God on man impress'd with force,
 Of all true wisdom is the first great source. ‡
 O daily! let thy supplications rise,
 To him whom glory veils above the skies, }
 Tho' nothing 'scapes his all-beholding eyes. || }
 If

* LUMNIEĆ is the city called in English LIMERICK.

† The "Liberal hand and open heart," of Gray's Triumphs of Owen, are called to mind by this allusion. Personification by quality is a familiar figure in Irish Poetry.

‡ "Timor Dei est principium sapientiæ." "The fear of God is the beginning of wisdom." Every reader will recognize these as the awful expressions of the wisest of men.

|| The entire sentiment of this distich is expressed by the single term, Ḑjćleć, in Irish.

If anxious cares disturb thy noble mind,                   145
 With him alone a sure redress you'll find.
 Run not thy wayward will's inord'nate race;
 It leads to fell disorder and disgrace;
 Daily attend, my prince, thy people's cause,
 For 'tis thy duty to dispense the laws.*                   150
 No easy task, with justice to decide,
 The tedious office yet you must abide.
 Thou placid mien,—of affable approach,—
 Be selfish caution never thy reproach.
 Gaming avoid, nor let the fair one's wile,                   155
 Nor feast, nor music, ever thee beguile;
 Weigh well thyself each man's alleg'd misdeeds, }
 Nor mind from opposition what proceeds;— }
 Interpellation oft the law impedes.— }
With

* By a maxim of the most ancient Irish Law, the King was the last resort in all cases of legal question. The maxim is in verse, and is as follows:—

Sjn caé sen-dlígé
 Caéa cníé cndelg;
 In tan h d'cndelg caé cníé,
 H and beap d'genn co níé.

“Perpetual every ancient ordinance of every country, as to rational decision: when any country is destitute of such decision, the undecided cause must then be brought before the King.”

With calm deliberation judge the cause,           163
 And justly dispensate to all the laws :
 Thy mind not sinking or to awe or fear,
 Or love, or hate,—t'observe the right severe.
 For sordid bribes of silver or of gold,
 Be not thy judgment basely bought and sold.   165
 Tho' numbers round thy just tribunal press,
 And loud demand their num'rous wrongs redress,
 Never imbecile from the task recoil,
 But fearless meet the honorable toil.
 Each charge investigate, reprove each crime,   170
 Replete with knowledge of experienc'd time.
 Though full the houshold of thy dome of state,
 With few thy royal mind communicate :—
 In ev'ry court will numbers e'er be found,
 Unfit to share in secret thoughts profound.   175
 With gentle condescension mild and free,
 Thy council treat, and high nobility,           }
 And thine own blood with noble dignity ;—       }
 The vig'rous race of Cas unmatch'd in fight,
 Who valour, worth, and majesty unite.       180
 But if war threaten,—thou must e'er oppose Determin'd resolution 'gainst thy foes.
 Avert not th' edge of thy imperial sway
 From highest nobles who thy laws obey.

In wood-crown'd Fodla, 'tis a law supreme, 185
 That just decisions permanency claim :*
 If friends oppose thee, firm resistance show
 'Till humbled, to thy majesty they bow.
 And shou'd thy foe to supplication bend, 190
 Forgive, and treat him as a new made friend :
 Thou mighty prop of Brian's race renown'd,
 When war destructive breathes the plains around,
 Furious be thy look and stern thy mient † ;—
 The festive banquet must reverse the scene, 195
 Where with thy visage, beaming bright as day,
 Dispensing honor's meed, benignly gay, }
 Transcendant worth you bounteously repay. }
 Curb thou the spoiler's impious course severe,
 The learned tribe propitiously revere :— 200
 And let thy heav'nly aspect beam serene,
 On all who audience of thy grace obtain.

In

* The old law maxim, already mentioned, is continually impressed, to enforce the observance of natural right.

† In peace there's nothing so becomes a man,
 As mild behaviour, and humility :
 But when the blast of war blows in your ears,
 Then imitate the action of the Tiger.

SHAKESPEARE.

The coincidence of thought between these two cotemporary men, is very remarkable ; but pre-eminent genius always gives adequate expression to natural sentiment.

In deed exalted, humble in thy pride,
 Most firm when low'ring dangers thee betide ;
 Son of my soul, be then thy spirit prov'd,      205
 And in the battle's rage persist unmov'd.
 Ne'er free submission to thy will restrain,
 And, strict, thy just prerogatives maintain : *
 To man of violence entrust no pow'r,
 Or else thy country rues the fatal hour ;      210
 For know, O ! King, disorder oft proceeds From such subord'nate man's inord'nate deeds.
 Attempt not, sov'reign of Tumonia's† plain,
 T' engage in war, that justice won't maintain ;
Nor

* Pereunte obsequio, perit Imperium.

TACITUS.

† North Munster. In the original it is, " O Sovereign,
 " of Cu's LEAP." Leim Chonchullain. "The
 " Leap of Cuchullan," is the Irish name of the Promontory of Loop-head, in the west of the County of Clare, opposite the coast of Kerry, where the mouth of the Shannon is several leagues wide.—It is a fabulous tradition in Ireland that Cuchullan leaped across from Clare to Kerry, when on his way to deprive Curaidh Mac Dary, (who had previously subdued him of his life) and mistress, Blanaid of Alba. This lady, who is represented of extraordinary beauty, is said to have been made a captive in Alba, to which an expedition from Ireland had been sent upon some extraordinary occasion.— Curaidh MacDary and Cuchullan were the two redoubted leaders

Nor e'er resign thy right for dubious peace, 215
 If thou would'st guard thy pow'r against disgrace.
 Restrain thy will, nor to extremes proceed ;
 Admit, sometimes, that thou be disobey'd.
 Yet sooner will the land thy rule abide :— Oppose strong patience to thy wrath's full tide. 220
 Slow to engage, but certain to maintain
 His plighted faith, oppressors to restrain ;

G

To

leaders of the north and south upon this expedition. In fact Mac Dary was king of Munster, and Cuchullan was a prince who might hold the sovereignty of Ulster in prospect. These youthful heroes quarrelled about the fair prize, and agreed to adjust the dispute by single combat; a very usual mode of decision among the ancients. Curaidh subdued Cuchullan in the conflict, and to put it out of his power to renew the contest, for some time, he, with his sword, cut off his hair. Blanaid, it appears, was better affected towards Cuchullan than towards Mac Dary. As in those times nothing was considered more disgraceful than loss of hair, and particularly when cut off by a conquering adversary, the northern hero could not decently appear abroad until his hair was regenerated. During this period he contrived to communicate with Blanaid, his innamorata, who settled a plan with him for the destruction of Curaidh. He used to come home at mid-day, to recreate from the fatigue of attending the building of a place, that she had persuaded him to erect for her; and after recreation used to take a nap, as the Spaniards do their Siesta. It was concerted between Blanaid and Cuchullan, that when Curaidh

To shield the weak, the turbulent chastise,
 T'establish peace, both lasting, just, and wise,
 A mighty monarch's reign immortalize. 225 }
 Tho' num'rous precepts still I could unfold
 For thy sure guidance, yet will I withhold Reserv'd my further counsel;—for, imprest
 Be this just maxim deep upon thy breast,
 Instruction briefly delivered is best. 230 }
 I will

Curaidh should be asleep, she would throw a pail of milk into a stream that ran by the mansion, on the bank of which Cuchullan was to wait the signal of seeing the current stained. The plot succeeded, and Curaidh was immolated. Cuchullan took off his prize, but the King of Munster's bard is said to have taken vengeance. He followed Blanaid to Ulster, and taking opportunity as they walked on the edge of a precipice, seized her in his arms, and hurled himself and her headlong into the sea, wherein they both perished. So runs the tale of old. Now I beg leave to inform the reader, that the simplest Irishman, not actually out of his senses, believes no more than the main substance of this story; but he delights in hearing an embellished detail. He is convinced that Cuchullan never leaped across the Shannon's mouth, but that he used great expedition in passing it;—and yet he calls it Cuchullan's Leap, from fancy. There is a heap of loose stones, that appear to have been collected on a mountain in the county of Kerry, called, to this hour, Curaidh's Fort, (Cairtíur Conriatú.) The story is true; the detail is fabulously embellished; for this

I will not, 'till my footsteps you pursue,                    235
 Praise thy fair limbs, or frame of fulgent hue :
 Son of my soul, I will not venture praise
 Of thy bright azure, of regal ease,
 Howe'er deserving, I'll withhold,—until
 You the wise precepts of thy bard fulfil.
 Thou lofty tree of wide, extended shade,
 Amid Ierne's noblest wood display'd.*

Nor

this highly mental people loathed and disdained a barren and jejune narration. The river is called  $\Upsilon\text{I}\text{I}\text{I}-\text{S}\text{L}\text{A}\text{I}\text{C}\text{E}$ , i. e. "The fair Rivulet," to this day.

\* This fine figure has been already observed upon as far as it may be said to be peculiar to the Irish. I believe the Hebrew has it also.  $\text{S}\text{L}\text{A}\text{T}\ \text{O}\text{S}\ \text{C}\text{O}\text{J}\text{I}\text{L}$ ; "A Scion o'er the wood."

$\text{A}\text{I}\text{I}\ \text{b}\text{y}\text{l}\text{e}\ \text{b}\text{u}\text{a}\text{I}\text{D}\ \text{D}\text{A}\ \text{C}\text{C}\text{L}\text{A}\text{E}\text{N}\ \Upsilon\text{I}\text{D}$ .

"The stately tree which all the wood obeys,"—are marked expressions frequently used by our Poets. It is necessary here to observe, that personal grandeur was of solemn consideration of old in Ireland, on the occasion of election to dignity. Hence our poets are minute in description of beauty. And whom, of any degree of sentiment at this day, does not majesty of appearance, strike with respect. It is natural, and the old Irish Poets felt its force, and gave it fine expression. I feel my own deficiency in giving expression to my inimitable original; but in this incomparable part of it, as of a style

Nor cheek, which like the heated furnace glows,
 Nor star-like eye, whence bright effulgence flows;
 Nor lips, which th' Idæan berry's tints imbue,
 Concealing pearly teeth, of whitest hue;
 Truth's crimson temple, whence with flowing tide
 Of eloquence, pledg'd faith is ratified.
 I'll not attempt, till you fulfil my lays,                   245
 Thy bright, majestic neck's descriptive praise:
 Whose lily edges round, impress'd, retain
 The mark resplendent of the golden chain.*

I'll

style not usual in other languages, I trust I have conveyed some strong likeness. Yet well I know that insensitive dulness will deem it trivial. I am obliged, from fidelity, to use the same English expressions, which the copiousness and flexibility of the Irish language finely vary.

* All men and women of dignity in Ireland wore gold and silver ornaments. These, as dug out of our bogs and morasses, at this day, have no parallel in all the world, for singularity and beauty of execution. How grand and commanding must have been the appearance of the Irish Princes and Princesses at their conventual assemblies, decorated with their gold and silver frontlets or glories, their broaches, necklaces, bracelets, and anklets? The latter ornament is not in modern use. The value of these ornaments was strictly regulated by law. See the elaborate and curious COLLECTANEA of the dignified and venerable General Vallanecy.

I'll not, I pledge me, praise the lucid hand,
 Whose beauteous fingers tap'ring straight expand ;
 O'er which pure splendor's fulgent glow prevails,—
 With row of crimson, bright, transparent nails :
 Nor breast, of force to break the brazen spear,
 Nor statesly side's extent, without compeer ;
 Nor round, strong knee, torose, well form'd and fair,
 Nor tap'ring active foot, alert as air ;
 Nor lib'ral soul, majestic, great, and good,
 Prompt, fearless, brave, impetuous as the flood :
 Undaunted, firm, with native valour fir'd ;
 For prowess, might, and steadiness admir'd ; 260
 Facetious,—mild, as zephyrs gently blow,
 Nor ever furious, but against the foe.
 Yet will I praise, nor will my voice alone
 Be rais'd to celebrate thy great renown ;
 Thou heav'nly visage bright of glow divine, 265
 Unceasing praise and honor shall be thine,
 If thou fulfil the purport of my lays,
 From letter'd source deriv'd of Wisdom's ways.*
 The glorious sun shall spread thy praises round,
 And feather'd songsters warble the sweet sound ; 270
 Each element beneath high Heav'n's expanse,
 Earth, water, air, will in full choir advance,

Each

* He professes throughout to have taken his doctrine from his ancient predecessors.

To sing in strain sublime, that ne'er will die,
 Thy beaming, sprightly, animated eye.
 The hum of bees will murmur o'er the woods, 275
 And sportive trouts will wanton thro' the floods,
 And e'en the sea-calves their deep tones will raise,
 At once with me to celebrate thy praise.
 The king, the warrior, the poetic sage, 280
 Who live to see the blessings of thine age,
 Will praise thy name, thy great wise deeds avow,
 And none thine equal, virtuous prince, allow.*

* This is, of purpose, concluded like Irish compositions, which always terminate with the word, phrase or syllable with which they commence. This was, of old, intended to inculcate repetition, and has latterly become the mark of the perfection or integrity of a composition. The Irish writers term this practice, Dunað; i. e. CONCLUSION.

---

INSTITUTIO PRINCIPIS,

CARNEM HIBERNICUM.

---

INSTITUTIO PRINCIPIS,

CARMEN HIBERNICUM,

AUCTORE

THADDEO, FILIO DARIÏ, FILIO BRODÆI,

SEU

BRODINI;

ALIAS,

ṪṪṪṪ, ṪṪṪ ḌṪṪṪṪ, ṪṪṪ ḆṪṪṪḌṪṪ,

ṪṪ,

ṪṪṪ ḆṪṪṪṪṪ.

Poetâ Hiberno, Sæculo Salutis, XVI.

Latinâ Versione verbum verbo fideliter redditum, cum notis;

A

THEOPHILO O'FLANAGAN, A. B.

GADELICÆ SOCIETATI HIBERNIÆ

A SECRETIS.

DUBLINII

TYPIS excudebat JOHANNES BARLOW,

Societati Typographus,

No. 29, Vico dicte, BOLTON-STREET.

M.DCCC.VIII.

ERUDITIS, DIGNIS, BENEVOLISQUE ADMODUM VIRIS, PRÆPOSITO SOCIISQUE SENIORIBUS, COLLEGII SACROSANCTÆ ET INDIVIDUÆ TRINITATIS, DUBLINIENSIS ;

Hanc Interpretationem,
cum maximâ observantiâ,
et gratiâ pro cumulatis in se beneficiis ; & eorum Eruditionis ergo, quod de hujusce Poëmatis merito sint qui optimè judicare possint.

D. D. D.

T. O'FLANAGAN, A. B., EJUSDEM COLLEGII, QUONDAM, DISCIPULUS SCHOLARIS.

PRÆLEGENDA.

CERTE parum esset hanc Interpretationem literatis viris exhibere, nisi notum sit quâ de causâ aut quâ occasione poëma inscriptum fuerit. Mos erat inter nostrates (Hibernos) antiquitùs, quod omnis, vacante principatu, à successionem initurus, non modo electione legitimâ sed e certâ familiâ, scilicet regiâ, adoptatus foret.—Post elevationem autem in solium dignitatis, lege cautum erat ut Philosopho-poeta eum de officiis admoneret. Poetæ Hiberniæ antiqui, ῥητορα, i. e. Philosophi, vocabantur; et erant equidem Poetæ nomine, sed re verâ Philosophi. In Senatu et conventu Principibus Regibusque a dextris semper assidebant; et eis admonitiones reipublicæ salutare dare semper licebat. Erant et ipsi de stirpe regali, et in sedem regalem, si occasio incidisset, illis ascendere licuit. Etiam et Reges ipsi philosophicam ut plurimum artem callebant. Poetarum Hiberniæ antiquorum manus erat nequaquam ut versus egregiè concinnos solummodo facerent, sed etiam ut mores, leges, instituta majorum, scientias optimè noverint custodirentque. In Hiberniâ antiquâ nemo nisi literis non mediocriter imbutus ad aliquam dignitatem eligendus erat, aut elevari potuit. Sed in literatâ gente difficultas hæcce evanuit; nec aliquibus aliis quam Stultis aut Stolidis impedimento esse potuit.

Hujusce Poetarum conditionis, in ultimo ejus discessu, erat Brodinus noster, sexto decimo sæculo salutis decedente, cum mores leges, instituta majorum, et imperium ipsum Hiberniæ immutata fuerint; tamen antiquam exercere artem non dubitavit.

Dunchadus O'Brien, quartus Tumoræ Comes, in regiâ et Reginæ Elizabethæ et Jacobi

Jacobi primi educatus, de regali stirpe erat Momoniæ regum. Brodinus hicce poetarum in Hiberniâ tunc temporis floruit maximus; et quoniam in ditione Comitis Tumoræ antiquam hæreditatem, et cam magnificam, haberet, illum hoc carmine officii admonuit, quamquam ille jussa et imperia principum, quibus novis honoribus cumulatus erat, fideliter facesseret; sed contra hæc nullum præceptum in hac Ode inaugurali deprendi potest. Omina præcepta ad res prosperè et benè gerendas tantummodo spectant; et equidem in hoc carmine vetustiorum omnium in Hiberniâ predecessorum, prosperas admonitiones, ut ipse præ se fert, lucido ordine digessit. Hoc ex notis innotescet.—At miserabile dictu, Brodinus hicce, poeta noster, e præcipiti in præceps prædatori militi Cromeliani actus, patrimoniiis amplis vitæque senili privatus est. Sic quoque periit Firbisius, (Mac Firbis,) ultimus Hiberniæ Legum Interpres. Sed de his miserandis satis: nunc ad propositum.

TEĠASC FLAĠA.

Caðġ Ġlac Dáine, Ġlac bpuatoġni;
no,
Ġlac bpuatoeða no éan.

Ġlór a tá aġi teġasc flaġa, alġe tá teét deġ-paġa;
Cuġi nġe an eġaġ, máð áġl,
Leġað tġne no tóġbáġl.

Oġ to nġeġ na neġc to nġ, (Ġlórte ġ mteġaġe áġtoġí), Tġce leġ no anileġ an ġhuġni, bġeġ nġ hanðġeġ a n-abpuġm.

5

Tġce

* Hibernico idiomate hæc phrasis exprimitur hoc modo :—de consequentia, seu, de abedientia rei quam agit.

INSTITUTIO PRINCIPIS.

THADDEUS FILIUS DARIÏ BRODÆI,

SEU

BRODINI,

CECINIT.

Multa sunt de institutione Principis,
Apud eum est adventus boni-successûs,
Redigere regnum in ordinem, si velit,
Deprimere Patriam aut erigere.

Quoniam secundum id quod facit*,
(Magis est instituendus supremus-rex,)
Venit prosperitas aut calamitas terræ,
FAS NON NEFAS est quod dico.†

B

Venit

† Fas et Nefas ut antiquis legibus sancita.

Τίς το 'η μήξ, πῶδ ἔο γγῆαδῶν,
 ἧῶδ ἔ το ηῖ νεμῖαζῶν,
 Κυρ ἑῶξ ἔο λῆν τῶν α λῆς,
 Νῖ ἡῖ γῆν ἀνῶν ἡλλῆς.

19

Τεῖρε, δῶξῆ, δῶξ ἄνα, Πλάγα, κοζῶ, κοῦῶνα,
 Δῖμβουῶδ καῶ, ζῶνδῶξῆ, ἔοξο,
 Τῆ ἀνῶξῆν φλαῶ γῶξοξο.

15

Ἄξ λῆνῶν μήξ το 'η μεῖτ ἑῶν, Τίς ἀῖξ, (ἡῖῶδ ἄν ἑῶῶν,
 Σῆξῆ ζῶῖ λῆντοῶδ ἡῖ α ἡν,
 'S ζῶῖ λῆξ δ' γῶντοῶξ φῆῖῆν.

20

Jc

* Omnium ante ipsum in Hiberniâ Poetarum testificationibus alludit.

† Hibernenses antiqui apprimè mentales Imaginationi serviebant. Mos erat ut omni, qui in dignitatem elevatus fuerit, Philosopho-Poeta Oden caneret. Hujusce Odés, lege sancitæ, hæcce dicta erant. “Sunt septem “ testes exponentes improbitatem cujuscunque Regis :—
 “ 1°. Senatium e suo conventaculo detrudere, sine verâ “ aut legali causâ. 2°. Justitiam infringere; 3°. eum

Venit de rege, affirmatio cum testibus,*
 Si ille agit contra regulam, 10
 Detrudere omnes utique de suis commodis,
 Non seipsum solum pessundat.

Inopia, fames, egestas annonæ,
 Pestes, bella, prælia,
 Clades pugnæ, horridæ tempestates, rapinæ, 15
 De improbitate Principis oriuntur.†

Assequens regem recti regiminis
 Venit iterum, (regium est lucrum,) Diffusio cujuscunque copiosi-productûs, illius tempore,
 In unaquaqûe parte declivis collis Feilimii.‡ 20

Ubertas

“in pugnä fugatum esse;—4°. Egestatem annonæ in “eius regno extitisse; 5°. Defectum lactis; 6°. Fruc“tûs sterilitas; 7°. Frugum contagio: Hæc sunt sep“tem vivida lamina improbitatem, (falsitatem) cujus“cunque regis exponentia.”

‡ Hiberniam “Declivem Collem Feilimii” Poeticè nominat Poeta, quod, Feilimius Legislator, ex suis excellentissimis institutis sic appellatus, ineunte sæculo secundo ejus Rex fuerit.

Jē 1 tcalnūn, toŕéaŕi euar,
 Eŕe a ŕroṭaŕō, ŕŕi neimŕhuar,
 Ūŕe a tū, acar tarṭe ŕeō;
 Lēŕ ŕŕlaŕē-ne tŕā ŕo ttuŕlter.

Ūŕiŕaŕō ŕōŕ, maō ŕeŕŕe teŕŕ,
 25
 Sŕeṭa luṭṭiara loŕŕeŕŕ, Tŕāṭṭ ŕibeŕṭe an iara niŕi;
 ŕāŕa ŕ ŕibeŕṭe o' ŕŕoŕŕē.

Leŕ tuatā o ṭāŕla aŕi a lāŕi,
 Teŕaŕe ŕlaṭa ni ŕulāŕi;
 30
 O 'ŕ ē a n-oŕŕe an ni do ŕeṭṭ,
 Do ni ŕiŕe o' ŕ oŕeṭṭ.

ŕe maō oŕŕeŕ do ŕaṭ aen
 Teŕaŕe ni ŕā ŕeṭṭ neŕiṭlaen,
 Iŕ mō ŕ ŕaṭa ē aŕi ŕŕiŕō, 35
 Le a ṭŕaṭ o' ŕ ē hēŕŕŕōŕi.

Teŕaŕe

* Stolidis quibusdam Anglicis scriptoribus commercii antiquitū Hiberniam floruisse denegatum est. Sed Taciti in vitā Agricolæ verbis hoc refutationi rejicitur :
 “ Portus per commercia et negotiatores melius cogniti. ” Veritatem etiam antiquæ Hibernæ Historiæ, ut indege-nis auctoŕibus relatā, Herodoŕus quoque, Græcorum maximūſ

Ubertas glebæ, proventus portuum,
 Pisces in fluminibus, tempestates serenæ,
 Apud eum sunt, et fructus arborum,
 A nostro principe quòd tempestivè mereantur.

Implebunt adhuc, si melius illi videatur,
 Series densæ navium
 Ora portuum placidi maris ;*
 Optio quæ adoptanda est supremo-regi.

Prosperitas terræ ut incidit in ejus manum,
 Instituire Principem est necesse ; 30
 Quoniam quod facit rex recti,
 Facit opes suæ ditioni.

Quanquam idoneum fuerit unicuique
 Docere regem quoad regimen justum ;
 Magis est munus philosopho-poetæ,
 A suo domino quoniam ILLE EST qui audietur.†

Institutio

maximus scriptorum, confirmat. Ille dicit “ Colonos “ ΣΚΥΘΩΝ, Rubri Maris oras, (tempore Mosis) habi“ tasse.” Sic et nostri scriptores planè plenèque affir-mant. Verba Taciti allata referunt ad Hiberniam a Britannîâ distinctam.

† Hoc nostris utique poetis maximum est. “ Philo“ sopho-Poetæ etiam a Rege observantia debetur.”

Tegate plača h' fesiom vltò, vògnatò an na handljetò;
 Dá fantozje eðim tar éire,
 Gan méim n' antozle d' éhceét:

40

Gac n' man, o pé na fen,
 Do b' lef lenán vltò,
 Of eim vji-vejetme an júl glan,
 Stujar óhpejete é'a óútajò.

Gan do éuatò do 'n n'jetajò man,
 bjaèra a vltò 's a vltòjall,
 So noé tar n-degrijs-ne anof,
 Nac neimóhjeté an bpeè bepoj.

45

Gan do éuatò tegate Torna
 So n-deé dhéraj m' clatna,
 D' na na m-bjan ó deéclár dor,
 Vjn Njall fa dáltan dafon.

50

* Torna, Κατ' ἔργον, Sapiens appellatus, erat Nigelli magni Instructor. Ejus ad alumnū Institutionis inauguralis Ode adhuc manuscriptis existit. Incipit hocce modo. "Accipe meam instructionem, Nigelle acer."

Torna

Institutio Principis est facultas poetæ, Admonere eum contra injurias,
 Si affectet gradum ultra rectum,
 Impetui cupiditatis non auscultare. 40

Unicuique Regi semper, a tempore majorum,
 Fuit e latere assecla Poeta,
 Ad veram custodiam normæ puræ,
 Clavus directionis suæ ditioni.

Ut processerunt Regibus unquam
 Verba suorum Poetarum ac philosophorum ;
 Quod procedat nostro bono regi nunc
 Ut iniquum iudicium non ferat.

Ut processit instructio Tornæ* (1)
 Nigello qui fuit alumnus illi, (4)
 Quod procedat fida-industria meæ artis (2)
 Nepoti Brianorum amænæ-Claræ Regi. (3)

Quod

Torna erat matrimonia conjunctus filiae Regis Mononiæ.
 Ex hoc intelligi potest nostros antiquos poetas esse de gente nequaquam infimâ sed supremâ. Nigellus, cognomine Noviobses, regnavit sæculo quarto salvis decedente. Numericis (1) (2) (3) (4) transpositio ne-cessaria in Interpretatione notatur.

Ծօ տ-Բաժ Եօրնույլ Կ մար Եօ Էւայժ
 ԵճաբԵ ԿորմաբԵ, առ ԷԷՏ-ւայր,
 Ծօ Էար ԷրոժԵ առ ԳԽՈՒՒ Եճայժ, 55
 Ձիյր ԿայրԲրԵ Լօռն ԼյԳԷճայր.

Ռօ Բ՛ յառն ՅԳԷյր ԶԵԲայ Գյր
 Կ ԵճաբԵ ԳյրՅԼան ԳյՅԼ,
 (Նյր ԳԽայԵ մայժնեռնա յօ 'ն մաԵ,) 60
 Ձի րայԵ ԷԼայր-Եօրնա, առ ԿորմաԵ.

Ծօ ԵԵյճ առ յ-ՅԼօր յԵՍ Զրուայժ յ-Սաճայճ
 Գար ԵճաբԵ Կիւրն ԷԷՏՏ-Էաճայճ,
 'Տ ա ԶԷճ ւր առ ւաճայժ ԳԼուաճ Ձի մւր ԿիւաԷԽայր օ Կիյրուաժ.

Ծօ

* Cormacus Longibarbus, sæculo tertio mediante, Regnum Hiberniæ inivit. Admonitio, quam Carbreo Liffecario, suo filio, scripsit adhuc manuscriptis ærat, continetque monimenta propè Christiana.

† Fuerunt plurimi hujusce nominis Reges Hiberniæ; sed hic qui designatur erat Achaius Magmedonius. Mediante Sæculo tertio regnavit et Nigello Magno, cognoinento Novi-obsedi, pater erat.

‡ Fithilus Regis Cormaci Judex et Instuctor erat, Ejus et sui filii Flathrii adhuc scripta remanent.

|| Antiqua Regia Regum Hibernensium, in Comitatu hodie Midensi. Collis amœnus vocabulo significatur.

Quod similiter prosit atque processit
 Instructio Cormaci,* primo tempore,
 Ad inducendam prosperitatem fundo Achaii,† Carbreo acri Liffecario.

Quod æqualis sit impressio quam fecerit hoc Ac instructio verè-sincera Fithili,‡ (Nec fuit causa depressæ-mentis Juveni,)
 In regiâ declivis-Temoriæ § Cormaco.

Quod conveniat nostra vox vestræ genæ floridæ,
 Ut instructio Constantini Centimachi,||
 (Dum Vigen Ramus fuerit cum parvis copiis,) Intra muros Cruachaniæ a Kiltthrodo.

C

Quod

‡ Constantinus Centimachus Rex Hispaniæ erat sæculo secundo. Eugenius Magnus, Rex Memoniæ, matrimonio conjunctus filiæ regis Hispaniæ, eum ad divisionem Regni adegit, Hispanicis auxiliariis adjutus. Sed deinde, in prælio Campi de Lenâ, sociatus et occisus est Eugenius; dum "Udus Ramus," i. e. Juvenilis Heros, Constantinus fuerit cum parvis copiis; sed in bellum detrusus argumentis et versibus sui Philosopho-Poetæ, Kiltthrodi. Figura perquam frequentissima apud nostros Poetas est homines arboribus comparare; pueros virgis, juvenes ramis, et viros stipitibus firmis et antiquis. Cruachania erat Regia Conactiæ olim.

Ἰο m-baō eoymuſi 'ſ euſo το 'n παῖ 65
 fuam fepāōac ſimi φαέτnac,
 Sa lān o'ā noſt-ῖaſōb ſuim;
 Τρε ḡlār māpēdille ḡhāruiim.

Ἰο τῆ μαρ τῶνε αῖτεῒ,
 Do 'n ῖſ, το Labuō Louſeē,
 Claō ſhneō nēniata o' n' rē,
 Deḡ-ḡhjaēra an ſhleō fēpēpē. 70

buaſō ῖſḡnaſō ῖāca Laḡa Ἰο mbj aſi nīac nīc Dhonēāca,
 Dnem le 'n mīnḡeō mōr ſſoni, 75
 Τρε ḡ'ōr ῖſḡ-ſhleō ῖōniam.

D'

* Transpositio linearum necessaria, numericis (3) (1) notatur. Feredachus Justus fuit rex Hiberniae seculo primo salutis ineunte. Ejus Judex fuit Moranus cognomento Sapiens. Admonitionem ei scripsit, quod Morani Testamentum appellatur, et nunc paucis tantummodo intelligendum est. Versio Anglica ejus apud me est quam antehac multis annis perfeci. Morani tanta viget Justitiae fana, ut etiam traditione dicitur quod torques ejus aureus pro jurejurando usurparetur. De hoc fabulosè proditur quod circa eodem falsi testis, ad ejus suffocationem

Quod consimilis sit ac portio successûs
 Quem assecutus est Feredachus Candidus Justus, Per vocem magnæ-sapientiæ Morani,* (4)
 Et multæ de ejus rotatis dictionibus sunt nobiscum, (3)

Quod veniat, uti perfecta sunt, Regi Labræo † Naviculario,
 Muro Familiæ indomitæ fortitudinis, Prospera verba Poetæ Fercarti.

Prosperitas Regum Regiæ Lugadii, ‡
 Quod sit filio filii Donchadi ; ‡
 Illorum quibus excultæ sunt multæ Regiones,
 Per vocem regii-Poetæ ante me.

Comitem

suffocationem contraheret, dum circa collem veri testis se expanderet. Hodie proverbium est, cum aliquis verum asseveraret, dicere, “ Per Torquem Morani ad “ id jurarem.”

† Labræus Navicularius erat Rex Hiberniæ ad initium Æræ Christianæ. Fercartus fuit ejus Philosopho-Poeta.

‡ Lugadius Longimanus hic designatus, Rex Hiberniæ, vixit mille annos ante Christam natum. Conventus et Senatum de Talten et Naas instituit.

|| Dunchadus, filius Conquovari, filii Dunchadi, quartus Tunoniæ comes designatur.

D' Iarla ua TTárl. γά 'n τοιητέε γ' ὁ, Ḡhúmfid m'xh, ó 'γ' d'ím dlíḡt'íh,
 Ḡímm-berca, aḡ a t'rl'x'e a t'íh, Slíḡt'e h' m'leuca d' á'p'o-íḡḡ.

80

b'j'ò náe ba valca d'ám'ca.
 In t'j' h' á'p'o-ḡhlaye o'p'm'ca ;
 2h' t'p'm'at-o'ḡḡ'p'e ó a t'á a'p' a'p' e'c'o'f'e,
 D'ar ḡḡ'áe'c'o'ḡ'ḡ-ne t'p'á a t'ēḡ'o'f'e.

O ḡuap' e'f'm'af eḡ e'lo'j'm ḡh'o'd'a,
 Donéat'ò ua d'p'p'ar' b'ó'p'm'a,
 Na b'j'ò an m'á'ḡ'ḡ'p'í a'p'
 2h' ḡḡ'í ḡ'm' d'á'ḡ'ḡ'el ḡh'áe'á'j'ò.

85

Tu'lle t'ó'ḡ' le ḡḡ'í ḡ'la't'a, bu'á'j'ò n-ḡ'í'ḡ'ḡ'ò, n'e'p'e h' n'e'm'ē'á'á'a,
 Roḡ'a ḡ'j'm, m'ó'p'-t'o'p't'e m'eḡ,
 T'o'p'e'á'p't'e, ḡḡ'ē h' ḡ'ua'p'm'ne'f.

90

910

* Thalus erat unus progenitorum principis cui Ode inscrip'ta est.

† Brianus Boromæus maximus Hiberniæ regum, ad
 Idus Aprilis, A. D. 1014, prælio Clontarfensi juxta Dublinium, contra Ha'ng' victor cecidit; Mod'la Nuad'ar

est

Comitem nepotum Thali,* sub quo fructuosa sylvæ est,

Docebo egomet, quoniam de me jure-requiritur,
Concinna facta, de quibus inveniet sua patria
Vias persequendas supremo-Regi.

Quanquam non sit alumnus mihimet,
Ille qui est supremus princeps super memet;
Noster Dominus-Heres, quoniam ille est sub nostro moderamine,
De nostris muneribus utique est ejus instructio.

Quoniam obtinuit suprematam supra filios
Modhæ
Donchadus, nepos Briani Boromæi,† Ne sit invidiæ illi
Apud semen clarum lucidæ famæ Fiachi.

Plura illis, (restant) supra veritatem Principis,
Victoria preliorum, fortitudo et constantia,
Optatissimæ tempestates, magni fructus arborum,
Proventus, pax et tranquillitas.

Mea

est aliud nomen Eugenii Magni qui Constantino Centimacho contendit. Ab eo Reges Momania originem duxerunt. Fiachus hic designatus erat ejus prouepos.

910 ḡlōr ης, a ηῖ Λυμνηῖς,
 Ταρ ḡαέ ηῖ ηᾶ ηεηέυηηῖς,
 Νᾶρ αὖ δᾶη δεηηαδοχε αρ η-δᾶη, 95
 Δη λᾶη δεηλαχετε αν δοηηᾶηη.

Τυς a εὐηᾶετα ος το ἐηη, ῥολληηηῖς τὸ ῥᾶο δῆεῖηη,
 βῆδ αὖ ἐηῖδε, εῖδ β'ε βες,
 Δη τῖ ο ῥῥηη a ῥῥηᾶεες. 100

Νᾶ τῆης εοηῖεε εεεταη δῆδ, Σεη η οηηη αν ᾶηηῖς,
 Τᾶς ḡαέ ῥῥη-εηηη η ε ηηη,
 ῢῥη-εηηη Δε αρ ηη δαηηδ.

Κυη το δᾶη ḡαέ λαῖ 'η a λεῖε 105
 Δηηηη εο δῆεηη αν δῆεηεῖ,
 Ηη ḡαέ ηῖ δᾶς οηηε οητ,
 Δη τῖ ὀ a ῥῥηῖε ῥηηηᾶετ.

Νᾶ

* Civitas verè celebris in Momonià.

† “Timor Dei est principium Sapientiae” verba sunt Salmonis qui sacris literis “Sapientissimus hominum” appellatur.

Mea vox ad te, Rex Limerici,*
 Super omnem rem ne obliviscere ;
 Ne sit oratio obliviscenda nostra oratio,
 O! Manus munificentissima mundi!

Intellige ejus potestatem supra caput tuum,
 Servi illi cum tuis-totis-viribus,
 Sit in tuo corde, quicumque fuerit,
 Ille a quo es in Principatu.

Ne desere unquam utrumvis eorum,
 Amorem et timorem SUPREMI-REGIS ;
 Principium cujuscumque veræ-scientiæ est illud,
 Perpetuus-Timor Dei super homines.†

Mitte orationem tuam quotidie in illius presentiam,‡ Obsecra ardentem illum-a-quo-nihil-celatur-et-qui-celatur-
ipse,||
 In omni re quæ curæ fuerit tibi,
 Illum a quo accipies levamen.

Ne

‡ Hæc phrasis uno verbo Hibernico, Djélejt, exprimitur.

|| Cassius erat Mononie Rex, Progenitor O'Brianorum.

Nã pje do pëjn to çoste,
 bje çac laj a çblaje bõpojme,
 Cúç an phobust ajn t'ajõ
 Nj hobajn uajne dñmajn.

110

Nã bj pëjõ fá éúçib éájç,
 O 'ç dje dñçeer jad d'edràjn,
 Zl çnúç rëjõ ç pëjõ tabac,
 'S fáç éúç çëjn co çnyenamac.

115

Nã tuç d'jmeç 'nã d'ól çleõ,
 D' çhonn ceçl 'nã çajreç majçden;
 Sjn doçberca éájç me a ceçerç,
 Çan dájç d'ojneçta d' éçteçt.

120

Zjn çnúõ, ajn uañan, 'nã ajn çhuajç
 Nã bejn, bj ad bpeçem neniluaçt, bpeçt nãr éõjn, a Dhoneatõ, õujç, Zjn éonitajb õjn nã arçujç.

bje mat, éçt a ççujçle,
 Luçt çëçda éúç éõmajçle,
 Çan eçla a çãpojçtë çjn,
 Lãn-çhoyçtë d'egna ç d'ajmjn.

125

Ne irruere secundum tuam voluntatem,
 Sit quoque die, Princeps Boromæe,
 Causa populi tibi curæ;
 Non opus est hominis pigri.

Ne sis negligens causarum populi,
 Quoniam de te jure-requiritur eas decernere,
 O facies placida facillimæ allocutionis,
 Et in tuâ ipsius causâ impiger.

Ne des (teipsum) aleæ, neque deliciis epularum,
 Nec studio musicæ, neque societati virginum,
 Extende malefacta omnium cum suâ justitiâ, Absque interpellationem nobilium tuorum auscul-tando.

Præ amore, præ timore, aut præ odio
 Ne fer, sis tu Judex lentus,
 Judicium quod non fuerit justum, O Donchade, tibi
 Pro muneribus auri aut argenti.

Sint multi, audi eorum quærelas,
 Turbæ impetrantes causarum Judicium;
 Absque metu eas te oppressuras,
 Plenè-expertus scientiæ et temporis.

Ξο m-baδ̄ l̄h̄m̄m̄ luēt̄ do t̄óūm̄
 Ξο m-baδ̄ uač̄aδ̄ t̄'aeq̄ com̄p̄m̄;
 M̄ōm̄ do luēt̄ ġač̄ ġel-s̄m̄m̄ ġlam̄
 N̄āč̄ luēt̄ do ġm̄m̄ do t̄ēnaδ̄.

130

Caġē aġġme ġe t̄'om̄eēt̄;
 Caġē om̄ōm̄ ġe t̄' ġh̄oġoġeēt̄;
 Do 'n̄ t̄q̄j̄l̄ meġ-Caġe δ̄ 'n̄ maġē t̄moġo, Caġē nem̄ēaġġ ġed̄ naġm̄oġo.

135

N̄ā ġm̄i ġaeb̄am̄ do ġeč̄ta
 O neč̄ t̄'uaġġj̄δ̄ t̄' om̄eč̄ta;
 Do ēġġe ġēġ-ġh̄ōδ̄la ġġ ē a am̄,
 Ξο m-be an̄ ēč̄t̄-ġh̄ōġm̄ aġm̄ com̄all.

140

Reδ̄ č̄anaδ̄, d̄ā c̄c̄um̄o om̄t̄,
 δ̄j̄ t̄p̄ēn̄ ġō teč̄t̄ an̄ un̄iōč̄t̄.
 M̄j̄m̄ č̄aġġeč̄ d̄ā t̄t̄j̄ b̄j̄t̄ba,
 δ̄j̄ ġō maġēmeč̄ maġm̄teġda.

Ūj̄ō ġm̄m̄q̄ t̄om̄da aġ t̄ul̄ n̄-ġm̄aδ̄ let̄. a č̄um̄ēδ̄ cl̄am̄ ġaġr̄-b̄h̄m̄am̄, ġġ ġm̄m̄q̄ nem̄t̄om̄ēa aġm̄ ġō t̄' n̄-ōj̄l̄
 le n̄-t̄eġ-ġom̄m̄ā aġm̄ ġh̄em̄ t̄'om̄ēġ.

145

Ξο

* Antiquum nomen Filenice.

Quod plena sit familia tuæ regiae ;
 Quod pauci sint compotes tuorum arcanorum ;
 Multi de turbâ cujusque Regiæ-nitidæ, splendidæ,
 Qui non sunt quibus arcana benè committantur.

Exhibe mansuetudinem primoribus tuis ;
 Exhibe dignitatem tuis necessitudinibus,
 De semine hoc acri Cassii, a quo bonum est pre-lium ;—
 Exhibe asperitatem tuis hostibus.

Ne averte aciem tui regiminiis
 Ab aliquo primorum tuæ hæreditatis ;
 Regioni ramosæ-Fodlæ* est illud suum tempus
 Quod primum edictum absolutum fuerit.

Cum tuis amicis, si imponant tibi,
 Sis fortis donec veniant in humilitatem ;
 Ad tuam supplicationem si veniat hostis,
 Sis condonans, amicus.

Sit vultus torvus incuntî pugnam
 Tibi, O columen natorum liberi Briani ;
 Et vultus lucidus durante convivio,
 Quo benè-distribueris homini tuum honorem.

Aspera cum homine prædæ ;
 Mitis cum ætate* scientiæ ;
 Sit tua juvenilis facies, magnifica, gravis,
 Franquilla homini tuæ allocutionis.

Altus in actione, humilis in superbiâ,
 Immotus sub adventum terroris,
 Sit tuus animus, O fili chare,
 Virilis in certamine et in difficultate pugnæ.

Ne amitte tuam prærogativam ; † ne renue tuam obedientiam ;
 Ne concede magistratum tuum viro libidinum,
 Obvenit, O Rex, contumacia identidem
 Terræ de libidine magistratûs.

Ne offer, O princeps saltûs Cuoni, ‡
 Ire absque verâ-causâ pugnæ in bellum ;
 Et ne condona jus ut præmium pacis,
 Si vis non ire in debilitatem.

Freena

† Nomen est fabulosum Promontorii ad fluminis Seni estium in occidentali parte Thamonisæ in Comitatu Clariensi.

Sajan pēd tōst, nā tar zo tjan; 165 řul'ajng ajn uajjō t'ainřar barō řojřte t'jn dōd tōl
 řjn t' řhořřtō me t'uabōř

Comoll břēřēne, břatāř mall,
 Tūřnam d'řmřāc, t'jn anřřam, 170
 Smaēt ajn ēajbteřb, eāř řřē, ř ūlad t' ajřdenajō āřdřřř.

Ře m-baō lja nā ař labāř řřm Teřaře ařam ad ořřēll;
 bjaō ljm an t'ajřēll tar m' ēřř 175
 ūřēřēř ř řēř an řbařřēřř.

Ńj mōlab, a meře m' oēta,
 Tuřa, ře a tař jmiōlta,
 Dōd tēne řojřm, řřřōa a tū um a tēřt,
 řo ccoml'jua tu' ař tteřoře. 180

Ńj mōlab řo tēř ajn mo t'řal, řēřa an ēņř 'no an eņēř dōngblan;
 Ńjam ēřojm ř nemēuingā řřō,
 D' řlalēōřl! řhel ēūbřa řařōřl.

Ńo

* Quicquid precipias esto brevis.

HOR.

Fræna tuam voluntatem, ne veni violenter ;
 Permitte aliquando ut tibi non obtemperaretur ;
 Erit propior terra tuæ voluntati ;
 Extende tuam patientiam cum tuâ irâ.

Perfectio promissi, promissum lentum,
 Depressio superborum, protectio debilium,
 Castigatio turbulentorum, stabilire pacem,
 Sunt portio dotum supremi-regis.

Quanquam plura, quam quæ diximus,
 Præcepta (sint) mihi in tuum usum,
 Erunt mihi reservata in posterum ;
 Perbrevis melior est intelligentia.*

Non laudabo, O fili mei pectoris,
 Te, quamquam sis laudandus,
 Tuo oculo cæruleo, regali, sum in meâ taciturnitate,
 Donec impleveris tu nostram instructionem.

Non laudabo, donec veneris in meum tramitem,
 Ramos corporis neque corpus nitidè-splendidum ;
 Splendorem arboris quæ est latissimæ frondis
 De generosâ sylvâ, splendidâ, suavi Gadeliorum.†

Neque

† Hibernenses Gadelii quoque dicti sunt.

No an zhuatò zo ce rjèr ce rtoéa; 185
 No an pèlta rajce éojmelta;
 No an bël tēobān, arj zhuatò zuz,
 'Zān buan an éēo-pāō cancur.

Lēzjōō d'j m zān tēēt zājzj;
 Zo ceomljna a ceanajzj; 190
 Nuatō-brāzhe, k a nam mar lʹ,
 Rjan an zhuar-nājle 'n a hmljō.

Nj molza me, zebatō zell,
 Douglaca k d'jzge zojnenn;
 Meōjz lomnerzela az brezē bājz 195
 Tar jrejt n-tojzj mzneō n-zājz.

Nā an tuēt blāzē brjēp d'azmzjzj;
 No an taeb zēzōa zocajz-jljzj;
 No an zljn dat-zel, éoncājz, éozjz;
 No an éozjz-ērozjz ačlam, étzrom. 200

Nā

* Per frigidum instrumentum poeta designat torquem aureum, regni insignie.

Neque genam cum splendore fornacis,
 Neque stellam oculi luminosam,
 Neque labia cum dentibus albis, coloris fructûs rubi Idæi,
 Quibus permanens est prima dictio quæ exprimitur.

Desinam egomet a disserendo de eâ,
 Donec perfeceris quæ cano ipse,
 Novâ cervice, et ejus color sicut liliû,—et Signum frigidi Instrumenti* in ejus marginibus,

Non laudabo ego, accipiam pignus,
 Lucidas manus directissimæ seriei;
 Digitos nitoris lucidi præcellentes
 Ordinem rutilum unguium splendentium.

Neque pectus prominens, fractor mucronis teli,
 Neque latus magnificum, strenuum, politum,
 Neque Genu niveum, compactum, torosum,
 Neque teretem pedem, pernitem, levem.

E

Neque

Nã an menma çobçajò, çajçnieé,
 Nenierêjç, êççajò, jmjçajççeeé,
 Sojnò, mer, laeéða, aji mējn a m-blojç,
 Rējçò, nenjçhnaeéða, aét me naniojç.

Holça mejç, ç nç me anãjn, 205
 Sjò, a çmaajò çorçera, çnúç nãjn,
 Dã n-çerina a n-çubçnamar njò
 D'çhonn-nannajò lebrã laçjòjò.

Holçajò çrjan laeçç ç çlór ên, 210
 Holçajò újn, uççç ç aççr,
 Zeçmolça çac tújl çã njn
 Do çújl nenjççerujçò, nãrajò.

çjaò çorç beé of bãrrijò ççò,
 çjaò lúç çrçç aji çujç n-jnðer,
 Nò çòmolaò aç çur lem,
 Ç çromçhoçar n-çam n-ðçlem.

çjaò an nç 'çã nãða njò,
 çjaò an çle 'ç an ççjnçjò,
 Nãé çujçççç, a nç, ç'açç neé ò'ór,
 çlen neé buò çujçççç aò çomjòr.

91—0—72.

Neque spiritum liberalem, sumptuosum,
 Fortem, alacrem, impetuosum,
 Serenum, agilem, virilem, ingenio festivum,
 Placidum, nunquam ferocem at contra hostem.

Laudabo egomet, nec ego solus,
 Vos, O gena coccinea, O vultus magnifice,
 Si perfeceritis quæ diximus vobis
 In modulatis versibus, politis carminibus.

Laudabunt sol diei et vox avium,
 Laudabunt terra, aqua et aër,
 Magnificè-laudabit unumquodq; elementum sub cælo,
 Tuum oculum, serenum, vigentem.

Erit concentus apum super cacumina sylvarum,
 Erit lasciva-saltatio salarium per spatia portuum,
 Te collaudantes, adjuvantes mihi, —
 Et gravis sonus vitulorum marinorum.

Erit rex dicens vobis,
 Erit Philosopho-poeta, et miles,
 Quòd non inveniretur, O Rex, de quibusvis principibus,
 Nullus qui sit tibi comparandus.

APPENDIX.

Adjicitur Interpretatio alius Odês ejusdem Auctoris ad eundem Principem. Exemplar Hibernicum videre est in aliâ parte hujusce libelli, ad calcem ferè Anglici Poematis.

Mei quatuor versus tibi, O Donchade,
Et fac ut dicent illi:—

Inferior versus non invenitur in eis ;
Arbores cum nobili fructu sunt illi.

Suspicare tuam Sapientiam ; dic pauca ;
Sis placidus quoad quæ te præteriverint ;
Ne fer judicium cum necessitudine quam proximâ,
Donec adveniat altera pars tibi.*

Sis mitis in regionibus amicorum,
In regione inimici ne sis languidus ;
Violens ad victoriam cum hostibus, Donchade,
O Leo de semine strenuo Cassii.

Ne exprime quæ intellecta fuerint tibi :
Parvum detrimentum facit silentium ;
Ausculta sermones hominum sapientium,
Intellige, et sine quod multa te prætereant.

Ne renue pacem ; ne evita bellum ;
Ne deripe sacras ædes quamdiu vixeris ;
Ne tua actio sit e tuâ linguâ ;
Ne moliaris perfidiam, et ne promittas bellum.

* Audi alteram partem.

DEIRDRI,

OR,

THE LAMENTABLE FATE

OF THE

SONS OF USNACH,

AN ANCIENT DRAMATIC IRISH TALE,

ONE OF THE THREE TRAGIC STORIES

OF EIRIN;

LITERALLY TRANSLATED INTO ENGLISH,

FROM AN

ORIGINAL GAELIC MANUSCRIPT,

WITH NOTES AND OBSERVATIONS:

TO WHICH IS ANNEXED,

THE OLD HISTORIC ACCOUNT

OF THE FACTS

ON WHICH THE STORY IS FOUNDED.

By THEOPHILUS O'FLANAGAN, A. B.

FORMERLY SCHOLAR OF T. C. D.

AND NOW SECRETARY TO THE GAELIC SOCIETY.

DUBLIN:

PRINTED BY JOHN EARLOW, 29, BOLTON-STREET,

PRINTER TO THE SOCIETY.

1808.

P R O Ë M E.

THE following Story, from the Irish, is the foundation of Mr. James Mac Pherson's Dartbula. It is properly denominated with us, "The tragical Fate of the Sons of Usnach." Upon a comparison, the reader will be enabled to judge of the vast liberties taken with the original by Mr. Mac Pherson, and also to observe his anachronisms and interpolations. In proceeding, too, we shall correct some mistakes, committed by the committee of the Highland Society, in their extracts from this tale, published in their report in 1805; although it appears from the fac simile plate, given as a specimen in that volume, that they possess a very fine ancient Irish Manuscript of this Story.—All the copies, I find, are defective in not giving the birth and education of Deirdri, (not Dartbula,) the heroine of the piece. This I am induced to supply from the learned Doctor Keating, who tells every story well. The following are his words :

Ṛēji-ḡḡal.

“ Կ ԿԱԾԱ, յՄՈՐՈ, ԾՈ ԸՅ ԸՅՁԱԾ ԱՅԱԿ
ԸՅՈՆԸԼԵՇՇՈՅՈՅ ՇՈՆՆԱԷՏԱՅԾ ԱՅԱԿ ԱՆՏԱՅԾ ՈՒ ԼՅՈՆ
ՊԻԷՅԾԵ ԾՈ ԵՅԵ Ե ՇՇԵՆՄԱԿ ՇՈՆՆԱԷՏ; ԱՅԱԿ
ՇՈՆԸՅԱՅՈՅ ԾՈ ԵՅԵ ՈՒ ՆԶՂ ԱԼԱՅԾ. ԸՆՄԱԿ ԷԷՐ-ՈՒ ՇՈ ՄԵՅԵ ԿՅՈԿ ԿԱՏԱ ՈՒ ԵԿԱԵՆՏԱ ԸԱՐԼԱ
ԷՏՇՈՐՈՒՄ ԱՅԱԿ, Ա ԼԷՂՇԷՇՈՅՈՅ, ԸՅՈՅԿՅՈՇ ԿՅՈԿ ԱՈՆ
ԿՈ ՄԱՐ ԾՈ ՄԱՐԾԱԾ ՇԼԱՈՆ ԱԿՈՒԵԱԷ, ԾԱՐ
ԸՅՄԵՐՇԷ ՎԻԻՅՍԱ ՄՅԵ ՐՅՂ, ԱՅԱԿ ՇՈՐԵ-ՄՅԵ ՇՈՆԼՅՈՅԷԿ ԱԵԱԿ ՉԽԵՏԱՅԾ ԾԱԷ ԱԼԱՅԾ.

“ ԼԱ

* He was the most renowned heathen King of Ulster in the beginning of the first century of the Christian Æra. This is sufficient to shew how regardless Mr. Mac Pherson was of committing anachronisms, when he makes him, with his relations, Cuchullan, Connall Carnach, and the sons of Usnach, cotemporary with Finn, the son of Cumhal, (his Fingal,) who died, according to our history, at the close of the third century. “Ex uno disce omnes.” From the liberties taken with this ancient story, common judgment will easily appreciate how he managed whatever other original materials he might have had in his possession.

This prince was called Conor Mac Nessa from his mother, as was his uncle Fergus siled Fergus Mac Roy from his own. It was the usage of those times, that any celebrated personage had a distinctive name, either patronymic (as here) or descriptive, as in the case of Dubh-tach

PRELIMINARY DISCOURSE.

“ There existed, indeed, war and hostility for a long time between the Conacians and Ultonians, when Mevia held the sovereignty of Conaught, and Conor* was king of Ulster. In order, however, reader, that you may know the cause of this enmity, I will here relate how the children of Usnach were put to death, against the guaranty of Fergus son of Roy, of Cormac Conlingas, and of Dubthach Dael of Ulster.

“ On

tach and Cormac, which latter was so designated, as co-exile with the other two after the breach of their Guaranty.

They had a solemn promise from the king, that he would not treat the children of Usnach with violence if they would induce them to return; but, contrary to the usage of the time, he procured their assassination; and it is traditionally handed down, that this was the first breach of public faith in Ireland. СѢО ѸНІАЧАР ѸНѢЖЕ СІУЕАНН. Cormac Conlingas was Conor's own son; Fergus and Dubthach, his near relations, and two of his principal courtiers. Fergus was even his tanist, or heir elect to the crown of Ulster. Dubthach was called the Chafer of Ulster by the enemies of the province, from his black hair or armour, and from his prowess rendering him hateful, as the reptile called the Chafer, which is odious, as supposed to be emblematic of the evil spirit.

“Lá naen, moorro, tá nteéatò Conéubay, Njog Ulatò zo teé fléshme mac Dajll, fceélayde Choréubay”, to éajéeni fleða, acas me lynn na fleða fji, rug ben fléshme jngen áluynn, azas to jme Caéyaò Dpa’, éapla fan ceonidájl an tan fji, tuari azas tapnizajne ton jéjji, zo tpeyfa jomatò tceáji dan Chóyòtò tá toyje. Jar na éloy fji don laéérayò, to éoyradar amaybatò to lá-éajji. N’j ténat, ajj Conéubay, aét bérayò mjji ljom j azas euyryod tá h-oyleniujn j zo rayò na haen níaj azam féjji. Déjrope to éajjmi an Dpa’, Caéyaò, ój. Do éuyr Conéubay a hóy ajj leje j; acas oje azas buyme tá hoylemajj, acas nj lámátò neaé ton Choy-geò dol na láéajji aét a hoyde azas a buyme, azas benéajnte Choréubajji tá ngojyéj Lebay-cim. Do bj ajj an ópítúgátò fji zo beje jomá-éajji ój acas fuy éjmi ajj níáib a cómajmjne j fceéjmi. Thápla, moorpe, tá hoyde laéé to máybatò

* This was a post of high distinction in those early times. It is evident from this tale, as well as numerous others in our language, that the druids acted as priests and soothsayers; and we discover that they were considered as the heads of all the scientific professions; and they were also considered as necromancers. I know

“ On a certain day that Conor, King of Ulster, went to partake of an entertainment at the mansion of Feidlim son of Dela, Conor’s Story-teller,\* Feilim’s wife lay in of a fair daughter, during the entertainment; and Caffa the Druid, who was then of the company, foreboded and prophesied for the daughter, that numerous mischiefs and losses would happen the province on her account. Upon hearing this, the nobles proposed putting her to death forthwith. Let it not be done so, said Conor, but I will take her with me, and send her to be reared, that she may become my own only wife. The Druid, Caffa, named her Deirdri.† Conor put her into a retired fort, and a tutor and nurse to rear her, and no one of the province dare go into her presence but her tutor, her nurse, and Conor’s conversation woman, who was called Lavarcam. She continued under this regulation until she was marriageable. It happened then, on a snowy day, that know no other term for necromancy in the Irish language but  $\tau\mu\upsilon\delta\acute{\epsilon}\epsilon\tau$ , i. e. Druidism, except  $\xi\epsilon\eta\iota\lambda\gamma\delta\acute{\epsilon}\epsilon\tau$ , i. e. Gentilism, which, in regard to the former term, is comparatively modern.

† This name is explained in an old Irish manuscript, to be hereafter introduced, as signifying Alarm.

inarbaðne þrosjun d'ollmúgað ðisj lá sneéta azaſ jar noonta ſola an laeſj ſan tſneéta, eromaſ ſjaé tub dá hól; azaſ muſ tuz Þéjndone ſju d'á haſne, adúbajnt le Lebaréam ſo m'a maſt lé ſéjn ſear do beſt aſce aſa a mbedſj na tſj daða ad éonajnt. ſjuna tá, daſt an ſbeſé aſa a ſholt, daſt ſola an-laeſj aſa a ſruaſð, azaſ daé an tſneéta aſa
 a éneſj. Al tá a ſamaſj ſju d'ſjor, ne þáſðtēſ Naſſi mac Uſneacé, a ſſoéaſi Chon-éubajnt ſan teſlaé. ſjaſeð a Lebaréam, (aſ ſj.) ſjuðmjſ tufa a éur dom accalam ſéjn ſan ſjor. Noédaſ Lebaréam do Naſſi an nj ſju. Laſ ſju éamjſ Naſſi óſ ſel a ntaſj Þéjndone, acaſ cuſneſ a ſju mēſo a ſeſneð ðe, acaſ jaruſ aſa j ſéjn ðo bſeſt aſa elðð ó Chonéubajnt. Tuz Naſſi aenta ſjſ ſju, ſeſ leſſ leſſ é d'egla Chonéubajnt. Tjalluſ ſéjn azaſ a dá bſaſeſa, ſoðon, Aljnle, azaſ Alrðan, azaſ Þéjndone, azaſ tſj éaogac laeé muſ aen ſju, ſo h' Albajnt, ſjſ a ſſuaraðan congbaſ

* That is, they and their followers were received into the king of Alba's army, and were assigned an appa-nage, or Land of Maintenance, to be held for service, as was usual in those ancient times. It must be concluded that the youthful fame in arms of Naisi and his brothers, was not unheard of by the sovereign to whom he

that her tutor killed a calf to prepare food for her, and, on his spilling the calf's blood in the snow, a raven came to drink of it; and as Deirdri noticed this, she said to Lavarcam, that she would be glad herself to have a husband possessed of the three colours which she saw; that is, his hair of the colour of the raven, his cheek of the colour of the calf's blood, and his skin of the colour of the snow. There is such a man, named Naisi son of Usnach, of Conor's household, said Lavarcam. O! then, said Deirdri, I beseech you to send him privately to address me; and accordingly Lavarcam discloses the circumstance to Naisi, and Naisi secretly pays a visit to Deirdri, and she communicates the greatness of her affection for him, and desires of him to take her by stealth from Conor. Naisi consented to this, though reluctantly, through fear of Conor. He himself, and his two brothers, Ainli and Ardan, and Deirdri, accompanied by one hundred and fifty warriors, made their way to Alba, where they obtained maintenance of quarterage* from the king of he resorted with such prompt confidence. In fact, the greatest intimacy and most familiar intercourse existed between the Picts, or old inhabitants of Alba, or modern Scotland, and the Scots, or old inhabitants of Eirè, or Ireland. Our own history truly informs us, and the venerable congbásl buannaéca ó Ríjé Alban, go fhuair tuarascbásl fgeime Dhéirdre, acas gur iar na mnaí ó'ó fcein í. Gabus féiré N'así gona brájerib uime sin. Tmallud a h' Alban an oilean mara air tejeró le Déirdre, tar éis jomad coisbhéct do tabairt do muinntir an Ríjé agas dáib fcein dá éisle roime sin. Uic ée'ona, ar na éloí an Ultaib go nabadar meje Uíneacé san éiceindásl sin, a dubnadar móran d'Uaírib an éisje ne Concubar gur éruaó clann Uíneacé do beje air deoraigeét tre óroemnaí, agas go m'a coisí fíof do éur oíca agas a tabairt don tír. Do beir Concubar aentaó n'í sin, air impóde na

 n'Uaíal, agas éus féirgus mac Ríjé, agas Dubcaé Daél Ulaíó, agas Cormac Conluinzef í sláib air fcein fá beje óíle dáib."

K. MS. HIST. OF IRE.

venerable Bede upholds and confirms its authenticity, that the Picts, in their voyages and peregrinations, long previous to this period, touched upon Ireland, then inhabited by the Scots, who gave them a hospitable and honourable reception. This was the foundation of a closely intimate connexion which prevailed for several succeeding ages. Alba was pointed out by the Scots as a place of that country, until he got an account of Deirdri's beauty, and asked her for himself as wife.

“ Naisi and his brothers being highly incensed at this, fled from Alba into a sea-girt isle with Deirdri, after they and the king's forces had many conflicts with each other previously. When the Ultonians therefore heard of the sons of Usnach being in this distress, many of the nobles of the province told Conor that it was piteous that the sons of Usnach should be in banishment for a bad woman, and that they ought to be sent for, and brought to their country. Conor consented to this at the entreaty of the nobles, and gave Fergus son of Roy, Dubthach Chafer of Ulster, and Cormac Conlingas, as guarantees for himself that he would act faithfully towards them.”

C

So

a place of easy settlement for the wandering Picts; they supported them with aid, and their principal leaders took wives from among the Scottish or Irish princesses, whose offspring, in the event of success, and success ensued, were, by compact, to be preferred in the succession to sovereignty in Alba ever after.

That this connexion was long maintained between those two nations of Picts of Alba, and Scots of Ireland,

So far we have followed Keating, in order to introduce the reader to the tragical story which follows.

we have the irrefragable authority of respectable Roman writers, as the connexion was long the terror of the Roman power. Silius Italicus, in his praise of Stilicho, introduces even the Saxons into the league, when he writes,

—————Maduerunt, Saxone fuso, Orcades; incaluit Pictorum sanguine Thule;
Scotorum cumulos flevit glacialis IERNE.

The Saxon vanquish'd, Orkney's Isles grew moist;
 The frozen Thule glow'd with Pictish blood;
 Her heaps of Scots cold icy Ireland mourn'd!

Here is a lamentable, but a genuine and incontestable proof of an intimate and long subsisting connexion, which the fastidious sophistry or contemptible ignorance of latter sciolists would fain obliterate, in spite of the fair evidence and truth of history. In fact it cannot be denied, and the honorable and intelligent of the modern Scots know and acknowledge, that a colony of Scots from Ireland finally settled in Alba, now Scotland; that the settlement thus made continued tributary to the mother sovereignty till released from such impost by the authority and influence of the presumptive heir to the Irish crown, the great Colum Kill, whose sanctified mental sublimity preferred the renowned mission of becoming the Apostle of Gospel Light to the Picts, to the transient sway of the sceptre of Ireland; and that at length, lows. The catastrophe is different in this, as to circumstances, from that in Keating, who faithfully relates length, upon the demise of the Pictish, the Scotish dynasty prevailed, through which his present Majesty derives his title to the throne of these realms. All this is incontestable historic truth, notwithstanding the fictitious reveries of Buchanan, Fordun, M<sup>c</sup>Kenzie, Mac Pher-son, and others, to discredit our history, which is not to be refuted by such groundless and airy presumption. “Non possumus aliquid contra VERITATEM, sed pro VERITATE.” “We cannot prevail against the TRUTH, but for the TRUTH,” is an ancient maxim, the value of which cannot be appreciated better than in the present instance.

Away then with those fabrications framed for silly motives, or for interested or unworthy purposes. Let us, both modern Scotch and Irish, pursue the more honorable end of preserving the valuable remains of our ancient literature, which was of yore, and may again be our common property. At no very remote period, we were united on the martial plain, against a nation whom we then considered as a common enemy, though happily now in union with us. I remember, when a boy, about four and thirty years ago, to have read with no small glow of national exultation, in a book with which I presume every Scotch and English literary gentleman is well acquainted, an account of a great battle between the Scotch and English, wherein the latter were totally routed, owing principally, as there stated, to the irresistible valour of some Irish bowmen who were auxiliaries relates historical facts, and we will hereafter produce an ancient document, which must have been his authority. The subsequent story, therefore, must be regarded as a poetic composition, founded upon historic truth, for the purpose of amusement, a frequent practice with our ancient poets. Among all our stories, which are very numerous, it has been time immemorial held in high repute, as one of the "Three tragic Stories of the Irish." These are "The Death of the Children of Touran, the Death of the Children of Lear," (both regarding Tuatha de Danans) and this, "The Death of the Children aries to the Scots. An English poet is quoted as having written on the occasion,

" To Albion Scots we ne'er would yield,
 " The Irish bowmen won the field."

Let us now endeavour to rival each other in the dignified pursuit of perpetuating our ancient glory, by rescuing our long reviled and neglected language and literature from oblivion. Yours and ours were long the same, and what remains with either must ever continue so. Many of our books you evidently have, from the specimens given in the Report of the Committee of the Highland Society, published in 1805; and if you are pleased to publish them, they will be yours and ours, as common property; and to this laudable exertion we earnestly and anxiously solicit and entreat you.

Children of Usnach," which is a Milesian story. These stories are set forth by the following old stanzas :

Τῆς ἐρῶαḡα na ἴσέλῳḡαἶτα.

Τῖῡαḡ ἰῡom oḡde na τῖῡῡ τῖῡαḡ,
 ἡ ḡḡm le'm ἔῡαḡḡ ḡeḡḡ ḡ'ἄḡeḡḡ;
 oḡde ἔῡoḡḡne Τῡḡḡeḡḡ τḡḡḡ,
 ḡaἶ τῖῡαḡ ἰaτḡa ḡḡḡḡ, a ḡeḡḡ!

Clanna ḡḡ accḡoḡaḡḡ ḡḡ,
 ḡallaἶτ aḡḡ an ḡ'ḡeul ḡo ḡuaḡ;
 Conn, ḡḡaἶḡa, ḡḡḡḡḡala 'ḡ ḡḡḡḡ,
 aḡḡ ḡḡ ḡoḡḡ an τῖῡaḡa τῖῡαḡ!

Clann ḡḡḡeḡḡ, ḡḡḡḡḡ na ḡḡḡaḡ, aτῖῡḡḡḡm le ḡeḡḡ ḡḡuaḡ;
 ḡ'ḡḡḡ, 'ḡ ḡḡḡḡḡḡ, 'ḡ ḡḡḡḡḡḡ,
 aḡḡ ḡḡ aḡaτ an τḡeḡḡ τῖῡαḡ!

LITERAL

LITERAL TRANSLATION

THE THREE SORROWS OF STORY-TELLING.

“ Sad to me the catastrophe of the three sorrows—
 Sweet to my ear is not their recital ;
 The death of the children of Touran,
 Is it not sorrowful to thyself, my son ?* ”

The children of Lear † in shape of birds, ‡
 A curse on the mouth that pronounc'd ;
 Conn, Fiacra, Finola and Aedh,
 There for you is the second sorrow.

The sons of Usnach, shield of men,
 They fell by the force of hosts ;
 Naisi, Ainli, and Ardan,
 There for you is the third sorrow.

The

* The story-teller addresses his hearer

† Lear the Sea, parent of the famed Mananan, of whom more hereafter.

‡ They were said to be changed by the incantations of their step-mother into swans.

The Versification in English, from the literal Translation, by Mr. William Leaby, a young gentleman from whom Ireland has yet to expect much celebrity..

THE THREE SORROWS OF STORY-TELLING.

Three are the causes dire of woe!
 How mournful is the tale to tell!
 My son, with sorrow wilt thou know,
 How mighty Touran's offspring fell!

Lear's noble line that wing'd the air,
 Chang'd to the bird's high scaring form,
 Conn, Aida, and Finola fair,
 Fiach, who brav'd each gloomy storm.

Be ever curs'd the tongue profane,
 Which plung'd the guiltless thus in woe;—
 O! would the hellish spells were vain!
 The second spring whence tears must flow!

Naisi, Anli, and Ardan's might,
 Usna's sons,—of conquering force,—
 By circling hosts subdued in fight:
 Threefold is now pale sorrow's source!

Ojðe Chlojine Ujſneac.

Fleð meðajr-éaejn, mðr-aðbal ðo pñnað
 le Concubar mac faetna fátaig, mje Roſa ruajð, mje Ruðrajdø, jodon, Rjg Ulað, an Emajn mñj alujnn Mhaça, ðo maſtjð acaſ ðo mðr-uajljð ajr éetna, gur ba fúbaé fomeninnaé na flójg ujle. Ró ejnge an aef éjuſ, ðmſjðe-ð, acaſ elaðna, ðo fejnn a ceputeða ceoljine caejnēðaéa, acaſ a tjomprána tajneimaéa tajdujre: acaſ ðo zabajl a n-ðrēta ffljðaéta, a cejaeba cójinneſa, acaſ a n-geza zejnelajð. Jte anmanna na fflleð jo bá fan dún an tan fñj, jodon Caðbað caemðraj, mac Conaſll mje Ruðrajdø, acaſ zemán ſruað-ſolaſ mac Caðbað, acaſ fejcejnne flle, acaſ zemán glúndub mac Caðbuð, acaſ jmað aſle jmmaſlle je Senéan mac Oſjlla.

24

* Now and for ages known by the name of Ardmagh, or Armagh, literally ſignifying the Height of Macha, from Macha Mong-Ruadh, i. e. Macha of the Red tresses, who was queen of Ireland, and foundress of Eman.
 She is the only woman who was ſovereign of Ireland before the coming of the Engliſh.

THE DEATH OF THE CHILDREN OF USNÀCH.

“ A feast of convivial exhilaration, grandly magnificent, was given by Conor, (son of Factna the wise, son of Ross the red, son of Rory) king of Ulster, in the delightful splendid Eman of Macha,* for his grandees and nobles, and other gentry, at which the entire assembly were gay and cheerful. Then arose their professors of music, and harmony, and poetry, to sound their melodious harps of sweet strings, and their bright, splendid tympan; and to sing their poetic strains, their branches of consanguinity, and boughs of genealogy. These are the names of the Fileas that were then in the mansion, viz. Caffa the generous Druid, son of Conall, son of Rory; and Gennan of the lightsome countenance, son of Caffa; and Fercartni the Filea; and Gannan black-knee, son of Caffa; and many more, together with Senchan, son of Olioll.†

D

“ The

† From this passage we know of what sort were the amusements of our remote ancestors at their grand feasts and entertainments. The professional characters mentioned

24 amlaio do do gnaicusaio fleo na h'Emna, iodon, a maio nioioa feim fa con-aia gac aen do teiglac Choneubair: aca afe i hni teiglaig Choneubair, iodon, cuise aia tri feic aia fe eio aia imle; do badan aia ag ol, aca ag aeioies, no sur togab Concubar a ollguic nioioa of aro aca afe io ro nioio. 24 aia leam a phiof d'phagail uabfi, an ffacabair niam teic bu feim 'na teic na h'Emna, 'na teiglac bu feim 'na mo teiglac fa aia aen maio da ffacabair a niam? Nio phacamaia aia iadfan: 91a' feo, ol Concubar,

tioned here were the most famous of their day, and are commemorated as such in our history. It is to be observed, that Caffa was cousin-german to Conor's father.
 These were the substitutes for the dramatic entertainments of Greece and Rome, &c. &c. There are but a few principal professors mentioned, but we learn from other documents, that each chief in profession had a numerous suite or retinue of professional attendants, who were obliged to bear a part on these occasions, for which they were all very liberally, if not extravagantly, rewarded. It does not appear that the ancients possessed a great variety of musical instruments; but they certainly were more than those here mentioned, as we shall see hereafter. However, the greatest old reviler of this country, Giraldus Cambrensis, acknowledges the Irish of his day unmatched in the art of music. But that was later by many centuries than the writing of this tale.

The usage at the feast of Eman was, that his own princely seat was appropriated to each of the household of Conor; and the number of the household of Conor was five and three score above six hundred and one thousand.* There they were at feasting and enjoyment, till Conor raised his awful, regal voice on high, and thus he said—" I
 " desire to know from you, have you ever seen a
 " house that was better than the house of Eman,
 " or a mansion that was better than my mansion,
 " in any place that you have ever seen?" " We " saw not," said they. " Now then," says Conor,
 " know

By their descriptions it would appear that the ancients were very fond of curiously and gorgeously ornamenting their musical instruments. This will fully appear in future publications; as will also, that their dresses and ornaments were very superb and costly. Indeed this has been already irrefragably evinced by the expensive publications and profound expositions produced by the unceasing industry and respectable erudition of the learned and venerable general Vallancey, every day receiving additional confirmation by the support of new discoveries of valuable ornaments of gold and silver, the price of which was regulated by law, and which were worn by our noble and princely ancestors.

* The inverted numeration is remarkable in this passage. It savours strongly of Eastern origin, as well as of the Eastern mode of writing from right to left.

Concubair, an aicm̃d̃ d̃sb̃ uir̃eabair̃ arĩ b̃re opair̃ f̃eiri? ñĩ h̃'air̃m̃d̃, an iad̃fan. Ñĩ h̃'ēd̃ f̃rĩ d̃am̃ra ol Concubair, aq̃ aicm̃d̃ d̃am̃
 uir̃eabair̃ ñid̃ opair̃, iod̃on, t̃rĩ m̃e Conair̃ll Clair̃ne, iod̃on, t̃rĩ coim̃le gair̃g̃iō na n-gae'dal, mar̃ a t̃ā t̃rĩ m̃e āsl̃ne, uair̃le Uir̃eac̃ do b̃eir̃ b̃āĩ f̃f̃e-g̃im̃uq̃ arĩ f̃on aen
 ñim̃ā f̃an d̃om̃an, iod̃on, Ñair̃, D̃im̃le, ac̃aq̃
 D̃ir̃d̃ān; ac̃aq̃ do ēoq̃nad̃ar̃ le neir̃ a l̃āñ
 t̃reō ac̃aq̃ leō D̃lban: oir̃ ñ m̃e ñĩs̃ go f̃rĩ-
 j̃im̃eē iad̃, ac̃aq̃ do ēoq̃coñd̃is̃ arĩ d̃rĩg̃e arĩ ñair̃s̃ō Uir̃d̃. Da lam̃ad̃m̃ac̃is̃ne f̃rĩ do ñair̃d̃, an iad̃fan, aq̃ f̃ata ō f̃oirĩ a d̃er̃m̃aif̃ ē, ac̃aq̃ f̃ōf̃ c̃ōr̃gead̃ Uir̃d̃ do b̃eir̃ a c̃eoq̃- im̃yl̃ac̃t̃ f̃e g̃ac̃ c̃ōr̃gead̃ aif̃e iu Eir̃im̃, d̃ā
 ñbeir̃e f̃an a b̃eir̃ d̃'Ul̃tair̃s̃ anñ aēt̃ an t̃rĩar̃
 f̃rĩ f̃eirĩ arĩm̃ārĩ. Oir̃ ñ leō, ñ arĩ ēr̃d̃āc̃t̃, ac̃aq̃ arĩ cal̃m̃ac̃t̃ iad̃.

¶ Ñair̃ ēd̃, an Concubair, cur̃t̃ar̃ t̃eēt̃a go cur̃t̃air̃ āsl̃ne oir̃e ñgl̃ana D̃lban, go loē ñ-ēir̃ē ac̃aq̃

⁂ Ulster.

† Ireland sometimes, but seldom thus written in the nominative case.

‡ Called the Lake of Etna, by the Highland Society, where the children of Usnach were at the time. A loch “ know you of any want whatever under which “ you lie?” “ We know not,” say they. “ Not “ so with me,” says Conor, “ I know of a great “ want which presseth upon you ; that is, that three “ exalted, renowned youths, the three Luminaries

 “ of the valour of the Gæils, that is, the three no“ ble sons of Usnach, should be absent from us
 “ on account of any woman in the world ! I mean “ Naisi, Ainli, and Ardan ; and they have defended
 “ by the might of their hands a district and half “ of Alba ; for sons of a king indeed are they, and “ they would assert high sovereignty for the princes
 “ of Ulad.”*—“ Dared we to say that,” said they,
 “ long since would we have said it ; and moreover,
 “ that the province of Ulad would be in likeness “ unto every other province in Erin,† did there “ not exist any more of the Ultonians but these “ three themselves alone, for lions in valour and “ prowess are they.”

“ Therefore then,” says Conor, “ let messengers
 “ be sent to the fair regions of Alba of resplendent “ clime, to Loch-Eitche,‡ and to the fastness of
 “ the

is not only a body of water surrounded entirely by land, but is also a name for an arm of the sea which diffuses itself, after a narrow entrance, into the land, as Lough Swilly in Ireland.

acaſ ʒo ɔaɪŋʒjɔn mɛ n-Uɪɣnɛac ɔa n-ɪaɪaʃɔ
 ɔaɪ aɪ. Cɪa nacaſ lɛɣ aɪ tɛɛɔaɪnaɛɔ ʒɪn, aɪ cāɛ ʒo ɔoɪɔɛɪnɪ? Nʒ ɣhɛɔɔaɪɣa ʒɪn, aɪ ɔoɪɔɛɪnɪ, ɔaɪ nɛɪ ɔo Nʒaɪɛ ʒaɪ tɛɛɔ a n-oɪɔɪ ɣɛ ʒɛɔ ɔa ɣhɛɔɔaɪ aɛɔ nɛ ɔɛɛɔaɪ ɔoɪ ɔɪɪ n aɪaɪn, ʒoɔoɪ nɛ ɔoɪaɪl ɔɛɪnaɛ, nɛ ɣɛɣɣaɪ nɛac Rɔɪʒ, nɔ nɛ ɔuɔɔulann; acaſ aɣɛɔnaɔɔaɪaɪnɔɪɣ, aɪ ɔoɪɔɛɪnɪ, cɪa ɔoɪ ɔɪaɪn ʒɪn lɛ aɪ ab aɪnɣa mɛ ɣɛɪn: acaſ ɪaɪ-ʒɪn ɔo nʒ ɔoɪaɪl ɪ bɣɔɔ ɣo lɛɣ lɛɣ, acaſ ɔ' ɣhɛɔɔaɪɣ ɔɛ, ɔɣɛɔ ɔo ɔɛnaɪn lɛɣ ɔ'a ɔoɪnaɔ aɪn ɛɛɪn nɛac n-Uɪɣnɛac ɛ, acaſ a mɪlɛaɔ aɪ a ʒoɪɛaɪɔ? ʒɪaɪ nac ɣɣoɔɪnaɪ, ɔɪ ɣɛ. Nʒ bāɣ aɛn-ɔuɪnɛ aɪaɪn ɔo ɔɣɛɔaɔ ɔɛ ʒɪn, aɛɔ ʒac aɛn aɪn a m-bɛɣɣuɪnɣɪ ɔ'Ulɔaɪɔ, ɔo ɔɛnaɔ ɔoɛaɪ ɔɔɪɔ, bɪaɛn bāɣ acaſ ɔɪmɔɪɔɛ

* Such vows were inviolate with our heathen ancestors. Any one became infamous who would break them; and the vengeance of Heaven was apprehended as the immediate consequence of their violation. This was the ancient chivalry of the Irish, upon which, perhaps, was grounded the more modern one of the middle ages.
 Those who were initiated into the order of valour, a very ancient one in Ireland, as it existed long before the Christian Æra, were peculiarly bound by these GESA, or solemn injunctions: ʒɛɣa nɛac ɣɣuɪnɣɪɔ ɣɣɪlaɛɛa. Injunctions not resisted by true heroes, is a usual

“ the sons of Usnach, to solicit their return.”
 “ Who shall go with that message?” said all universally. “ I know not that,” says Conor, “ for “ Naisi is under solemn vow* not to return west“ ward but with either of the three alone; that is,
 “ with Conall Carnach, or with Fergus son of “ Roy,† or with Cuchullan; and I will know
 “ now,” says Conor, “ who of the three best loves “ myself;”‡ and after that he took Conall into a place apart, and asked of him, what he would do unto him, if he would send him for the sons of Usnach, and that they should be destroyed over his guaranty? “ As I purpose not,” says ~~he~~<sup>he</sup>, “ It is not one man’s death alone that would “ thence ensue, but each of the Ultonians
 “ who would injure them, whom I should ap“ prehend, on him would I inflict the sorrow of “ death and abridgment of life.” “ True it is,” says

usual expression in our ancient tales.—Quære! Were these the Gessatæ of Roman story, or were they like them? Was our  $\text{ᚠ} \text{a} \text{ᚠ}$ , or javelin, the Gesa?

† He was so called from his mother; even our poets denominate his descendants O’ Roy, or descended of Roy, as may be collected from the following stanza, spoken by a bard of the last, or preceding century, upon hearing a dove coo from Mothar-I-Roy, the Ruin of O’Conor

τῆμδὶβὲ φαεῖσιν δ' ἰμῆτε φαῖν. Ἄς ἦν ἦν ἀρ, Conéubair, tuḡimḡ naé imiun̄letsa me ḡḡin:
 ἀεας το εῦν Conall uajō, ἀεας tuḡ Cúéuloimn

nor Corcamroy's mansion, in the north-west part of the County of Clare, where the poet designates the ancient proprietor by the patronymic appellation of O'Roy, as that princely family, now nearly extinct, was descended from Fergus the son of Roy here mentioned :

Ἄ εῦν an éeoj̄i b̄rōnaḡs 'fan dún tub̄ tall,
 'ḡoj̄ib̄ an rōim̄ nōḡmarḡo fút̄ so φαm;
 τυλαέ uḡRōḡs̄ n̄ōḡḡaj̄ō na m-búḡḡeō m-beam,
 ḡan̄ éuḡḡe, ḡan̄ ḡpōḡḡe ḡeolta, ḡan̄ lúbaō lann!

TRANSLATION.

O! dove of mournful strain in yon dark dome,
 How sad this fashion'd pile, thy realm of gloom!
 Great O'Roy's hill, that rang with trumpets roar,
 With hosts, or justs, or tilts, resounds no more!

The Galic reader will perceive that this is closely literal.

Fergus's father was Ross the red. He was therefore uncle to Conor. Cuchullian and Conall Carnach were cousin-germans to the children of Usnach, being all the children of Caffa's three daughters, as recited in the following ancient genealogical poem:

Caḡbaō

says Conor, "I perceive that dear to you I myself am not." And he sent Conall away from him,

E

Catbaid mac Maelceis na cepeac,
 ceo fher'ga nasbe Māgac;
 a dū fher esle, buan a m'beadg,
 Rosa nuad, Caspne cendeasg.

Tyar d'ū rug Māgac clann glann,
 Rosa nuad, Caspne h' Catbaid;
 dejenebur patmar se a rojn,
 do b' ag Māgac mala-dyinn.

Ty' dejs-mje le Rosa nuad,
 'f cejene mje le Caspne c'nuad;
 flata fmgela gan asl,
 'f ty' h'ngena le Catbaid.

Rug Māgac do Chaebaid Dnas, ty' h'ngena fa māj gna,
 do éjnn a ce nué tar gac aen,
 Dejejnn, 2ylbe 'gus fjnné aem.

fjnné aem, jngen Catbaid éajn, dejs-majen Chonall Cherpnasg;
 ty' mje 2ylbe nān ob ūd,
 Nasb, h' 2ymle, h' 2ytdān.

Mac

éulojnn éujze acas d'fhlafras de mur an-ceētna; do bejnnis mo bhacair, ar Cú-éulojnn, dá fhorcáfa sin foramra, acas a ttabairt

Mac do Dhéirenn na n'gnao d'glañ, Cúéulañ d'una delgan,
 Na éois me gan gnáñ n-ghuñ,
 as trí h'ingenasb Chačbaō.

Do élojnn Değada, méio n'gusa, Mágac ingen. Ne n'gusa;
 sin Ulaō asis no an,
 N'j nuğ aen mac do Chačbaō.

LITERAL TRANSLATION.

Caffa, son of Maelga of the spoils,
 The first man who possessed Maga;
 Her two other husbands, lasting their renown,
 Ross the ruddy, and Cairbri red-head.

Three for whom Maga bore offspring bright,
 Ross the ruddy, Cairbri and Caffa;
 Ten, prosperous to be enumerated,
 Had Maga of dark-brown brow.

Three excellent sons by Ross the red,
 And four sons by Cairbri hard;
 Scions fair-bright, without blemish;
 And three daughters by Caffa.

him, and he took Cuchullan unto him, and he questioned him in the same manner. "I pledge
 "my solemn asseveration," says Cuchullan, "that "if you would ask that of me, and that they "would

Maga bore to Caffa the Druid
 Three daughters of excellent beauty,
 Who surpassed in form above all else,
 Deitin, Ailbhi, and Fincæmh.

Fincæmh, daughter of generous Caffa,
 The worthy mother of Conall Carnach ;
 The three sons of Ailbhi, that refused not fight,
 Naisi, and Ainli, and Ardan.

Son to Deitin of splendèd cheeks,
 Cuchullan of Dundalغان ;
 The five sons, who feared not wounds,
 Had the three daughters of Caffa.

Of the descendants of Degad, great in might,
 Was Maga daughter of Ængus ;
 The men of Ulster with her abode,
 She bore not one son to Caffa.

*The English Versification, from the literal Translation,
 by Mr. William Leahy.*

Mælgæ's brave son, who from the bloody field
 Bore off the spoils upon his batter'd shield,— Caffa, the first, receiv'd fair Maia's hand :
 Two other lords she had, whose fame shall stand,
 Cairbir, red-hair'd chief, and Ross the brave ;
 To three the heav'nly Maia offspring gave,

Who

τταβαπτ εζαδο εum a μαρβρα, ηαε αεντυνη αμαη το τυτφαο φαη η-ζηση, αετ ζαε αεν τ'υλλεαβ αηη a μβεργαηηηη, βηαεν βαηη

Who prov'd their mighty source by matchless might,
 From Caffa, Ross, and Cairbir, fierce in fight ;
 High on the wing of Fame for e'er to soar,
 Full ten in all the dark-brow'd Maia bore ;
 Three warlike sons had Ross, with glory fir'd,
 Who to victorious deeds in war aspir'd ;
 And four can Cairbir, hardy warrior, claim,
 Brave youths, of form divine, and spotless fame ;
 Three lovely daughters, too, the matron bless'd,
 Who Caffa for their honor'd sire confess'd ;—
 Fincæva, Detin, Alva the serene,
 Who stood unrivall'd in resplendent mien ;
 From gen'rous Caffa sprung, Fincæva fair
 Own'd Conall Carna her illustrious heir ;
 Alva's three sons, impetuous in the fight,
 Were Naisi, Anli,—Ardan's conqu'ring might ;
 From Detin, heav'ny fair ! Cuchullan came,
 Whom high Dundalga honor'd with its name,
 Five youthful warriors, Caffa their great-sire,
 Swept the wide field, and made whole hosts retire.
 Fair Maia sprung from Degad's noble line,
 Ængus her sire—and of descent divine ;—
 Full three Ultonian lords possess'd the dame,—
 No son she bore to Caffa's mighty fame.

† Here Conor's design of vengeance begins to disclose itself by insinuation. It appears that Conall Car-na and Cuchullan, the cousin-germans of the children of Usnach, were aware of his design, and gave him discouraging

“ would be brought unto you to be slain,
 “ it is not one man alone that would fall for the “ deed, but every one of the Ultonians whom I should “ lay couraging answers. But he knowing his own power, and intent on his dark design, is determined to persevere, although he had cause of apprehension from the might and popularity of his rivals and their adherents, who were all his own close relations by consanguinity. He makes his first proposal to those of closest connexion with the sons of Usnach, and having discovered their disposition, he next applies to Fergus, his own uncle, and his next in authority and dignity in the province, but to his certain knowledge most affectionately attached to the sons of Usnach. He is answered with declared suspicion by all, but Fergus exempts his life from his own vengeance should he prove treacherous; and therefore knowing he may rely with confidence on his fidelity, he selects him for the mission. It seems all the nobles were diffident of his sincerity, and led to consent to the recall, not so much from a confidence in their own power of protection, great as that certainly was, but from a religious reliance on his plighted word. But the power of jealousy overbore his religious obligation. He broke his public faith, solemnly pledged, and then first violated. The vengeance for this perfidy was signal. Fergus and the other guarantees outraged, fled to Mevia, paramount queen of Conaught. A desolating war was raised against Ulster, which terminated in the destruction of Eman. The particular circumstances of this war are detailed in the ancient tales of τὰν βό Cυλζνε, The Cattle Spoil of Cualgny, and in βυλζεc μόν Mhazje Muscejiine, The great breach of the Plain

 of

báif acas fēin-faeḡaif do tabairt dō.
 2lf fīn fīn, a Cūcūalaim, ol Concūbar, tuḡimif nāc imūin letfa mē fēin, acas do ēuir Cūcūloim uada, acas tuḡ fēnḡuf
 ēuḡe, acas d'fhiafnaif dē mūr an ḡcēdna;
 af ēd a dubairt fēnḡuf fīf, ḡelluimif ḡan dol fād fhūif, ḡidēad nī fīf Ulltaē
 aif a mbērfuim aḡ dēnam doēair dōif, nāc tḡubruim bnaen báif acas bīc euga dō.
 2lf fīn fīn, an Concūbar, af tuḡa naēaf aif
 a cēem, acas ḡluaf nōmad a mānaē ann, oif if let tḡeaf fīad, acas aḡ tēēt anoif dūit, ḡab ḡo dūnbhoruif mac caifte, acas tabairt bnaēar dānifa, ēom-luaif if tḡucuf tu, clann Uifnaē do ēuir ḡo h-Emain, mā oifdēe no lō dōif aḡ tēēt ann. Iaf fīn tān-caif af tēē aif aen, acas do imif fēnḡuf do ēaē ē fēin do ēuir fan t-ḡlāmḡēēt fīn.
 2leas do nḡaif af an aifdē fīn.

Do

of Murthemny, where Cuchullan was slain. This note is true history, and discloses the whole plot of this dramatic tale, for such would I have the reader to accept it. The genius of Shakespeare would work it out into a noble tragedy.

"lay hold on should meet the sorrow of death and
 "abridgment of life." "That is true; Cuchul-
 "lan," says Conor, "I understand that dear to
 "you I myself am not." And he put Cuchul-lan from him, and took Fergus unto him, and questioned him in like manner. This is what Fergus said unto him: "I promise not to attempt
 "thy blood; however, there is not an Ultonian
 "whom I should catch doing them injury, to "whom I would not give the affliction of death and
 "condition of repose." True it is," says Conor,
 "it is you that must go for them, and move thou
 "forward to-morrow thither," says he, "for with
 "you will they come; and on thy coming from east"ward, go unto the mansion of Barach son of "Cainti,* and pledge thy solemn word to me, that
 "as soon as thou shalt have arrived, thou wilt send
 "the children of Usnach to Eman, whether it be "night or day with them on their arrival." After this they came intogether, and Fergus told the rest, of his being himself on this guaranty; and so they bore away that night.

Conor

* One of the nobles of the king's household, whose residence was on the coast of Ulster, immediately opposite to ALBA, or modern SCOTLAND.

Do aigeis Conéubar boraé, acas do fhia-fpaig dé, an naité fletó oiliam aige do? a cá an boraé, acas gé gur ffeioin liom a dénam nhrbfeioin liom a h-oméan go h-Émáinn.
 Ma'f éò, ahr Conéubar, tabair d'fheinguf
 í mair af caefga éucraf; a n-Éiminn; Óhr h da gēfaió fletó d'obaò. Do géil boraé fhr
 do. Do éagadar af an oíóce fhr.

Da gluaif fergus ahr na máraé acas nhr
 nué lef do íluag ho do íócaíóe, aét é fēim.
 acas a óiaf mac, íódon, Illann fhrm acas
 buime bonb-ruaò, acas Cailhonn, íódon, golla na h-íubraigé, acas an íubraé fēim.
 Do gluaifedair íómpa go daingēn mac
 n'Uíneacé, acas go loé n'Éjéé an Uibairn.
 Do

* From this, and a subsequent passage, it would appear that Barach was in Conor's confidence, and well acquainted with his design; and also, that it was apprehended by Conor and his adherents, that if Fergus would arrive in company with the sons of Usnach, his power and authority would be paramount for their protection.

† Such were the sure and insuperable means of detaining the sincere, upright, and heroic Fergus. His Gesa were inviolate.

‡ Meaning that so they passed that night, that is, that all was settled for that night, and no further interuption

Conor addressed Barach, and asked of him whether he had a feast prepared for him? "I have," says Barach, "and though I was able to prepare it, I was not able to bear it to Eman."* "Why then," says Conor, "give it to Fergus soon as ever he shall arrive in Erin, for it is of his solemn ties† not to refuse a feast," Barach promised him this: thus they bore away that night.‡

"Fergus proceeded the next day, and took not with him of troop or host, but himself and his two sons, namely, Illan the Fair, and Buine the Ruthless Red; and Callon, who was his shield-bearer, and the shield itself.§ They moved forward to the fastness of the sons of Usnach, and to the Lake Eitche, in Alba. Thus stationed were the sons of F Usnach.

ruption of mirth took place. Thus I might have translated, but I choose to be even idiomatically literal.

§ Is this the origin of the Knight and Esquire of the middle ages? This tale was certainly written many centuries before the age of romance. Although they have some distinctive marks common to both, yet the stamp of antiquity is evident in its true place, in regard to the Irish institution of the ḡaifḡe, or valour, and the chivalry, or knighthood, of subsequent ages. This we shall have occasion hereafter to observe upon, in giving the initiation of Cuchullan.

2ly anilajð do báðar elann Uígneacé, acaq tpi qamiboza aca, acaq an boze ann a nibrujetoj a bpróim, ný mci d'jeoðj, acaq an boze ma n'jeoðj ný mci do éoolaoðj:
 acaq ari tteét d'ferguq fan imðar, do léjs glaeð nioj xhejne aq, acaq q anilajð bñ Naqj acaq Dejpore, acaq an éennéamí etarra, iodon, qjéslí Chonéubarr, acaq jad aq
 impe uppe: do éuala Naqj an glaeð, acaq a dubarr, do éluim glaeð Eijimajq. Ný glaeð Eijimajq qúo, ol Dejpore, aét glaeð Albanajq; do ajeñ Dejpore ééoglaeð fberguq, acaq do éeñ í; acaq do léjs ferquq an dapa glaeð aq, q glaeð Eijimajq qñ ar Naqj. Ný h'éð aét glaeð Albanajq, so deimí, ol Dejpore, acaq imram éopojm.
 Do léjs ferquq an tpeq glaeð, acaq do ajeñ me Uígneacé gur ab é ferquq do léjs an glaeð, acaq a dúbarr Naqe le h'Altoán dul ari éeñ ferquq. No rájo Dejpore gur ajeñ qj qjeñ an ééð glaeð no léjs ferquq.
 Cpeð

* In time of repose from the seats of war, the hardy amusements of the ancients of Erin were hunting and hurling, jomáim or cup báimé, a manly game peculiar to the Irish, which shall be described in the story of Cuchullán hereafter. Their recreative amusement was the noble game of chess. Their festive entertainments have been already described.

Usnach. They had three booths of chase;* and the booth in which they prepared their food, not in that did they eat it; and that in which they eat, not in that did they sleep. And when Fergus came into the harbour, he sent forth of him the loud cry of a mighty man of chase. And Naisi and Deirdri were then seated together, and the polished cabinet† between them, that is, Conor's chess-board, and they playing upon it. Naisi heard the cry, and said, "I hear the call of a man of Erin." "That was not the call of a man of Erin," says Deirdri,‡ "but the call of a man of Alba." Deirdri knew the first cry of Fergus, and she concealed it. Fergus uttered the second cry.<sup>1</sup> "That is the cry of a man of Erin," says Naisi. "It is not indeed," says Deirdri, "and let us play on." Fergus sent forth the third cry, and the sons of Usnach knew it was Fergus that sent forth the cry. And Naisi ordered Ardan to go to meet Fergus. Deirdri declared she knew the first call sent forth by Fergus.

"Why

† Every thing belonging to a great personage of old had a peculiar name; such as his armour, arms, chess-board, &c.

‡ The apprehensive caution and foresight of Deirdri is admirably well maintained throughout the remainder of this tale.

Cpeo ʒan ʒesly ʒm a nʒozum, an Naxi?
 2lylyng do ʒonnape me a pʒm, an Dʒmope, jodon tʒy h'eojn do ʒeʒt ʒuzajm o ʒamujnʒhaʒa, acas tʒy bolʒum mela 'n a mbelaʒo leo, acas a ʒʒaʒbaʒl aʒajme, acas tʒy bolʒum ʒan bʒyʒl do bʒeʒt leo. Cpeo ʒ an bʒeʒt a tʒa aʒad uʒme ʒm, a nʒuzum, an Naxi? 2 tʒa, an Dʒmope, ʒeʒʒy do ʒeʒt ʒuzajm ie teʒtaʒaʒt ʒʒeʒana o Chonʒuban, oʒn nʒ mʒʒe mʒl no teʒtaʒaʒt ʒʒeʒana an ʒujne bʒeʒaʒo; leʒʒ ʒm ʒant, an Naxi; aʒ ʒada a tʒa ʒeʒʒy ʒ an bʒoʒt, acas eʒnʒe
 a 2mʒajm an a ʒem, acas tabajm let ʒ.
 ʒluazʒoʒ 2mʒaʒn ʒojme mʒr a ʒaʒo ʒeʒʒy
 acas ʒojnʒaʒ ʒoʒa ʒo ʒyl ʒʒeʒa do ʒeʒn, acas ʒ'a ʒaʒ mac mʒr aʒn ʒnʒ, acas ʒ ʒo a ʒuʒaʒt, mo ʒojn ʒo a ʒyʒeʒeʒta m-nujm. 2cas aʒ a h'aʒe ʒm do ʒhaʒʒaʒʒ ʒʒeʒa na h'eʒmeʒm ʒʒoʒ, acas ʒ'mʒʒoʒan ʒm do, acas ʒan ʒm ʒaʒeʒaʒan mʒr a ʒaʒo Naxi, 2mʒle acas Dʒmope, acas do ʒojn-bʒaʒan ʒoʒa mʒo a ʒ'eʒʒy ʒon a macuʒo, acas ʒ' ʒhaʒʒaʒʒeʒaʒ ʒeʒeʒa na h'eʒmeʒm ʒʒoʒ. 2ʒ ʒad ʒeʒeʒa aʒ ʒeʒn aʒajm, an ʒeʒʒy, Chonʒuban ʒaʒ ʒeʒme a ʒeʒon acas
 a ʒlanaʒaʒt an ʒan ʒeʒon ʒa. Nʒ h'mʒul-ʒa ʒoʒʒan am ʒm, an Dʒmope, oʒn ʒ mʒ a ʒʒa.

“Why didst thou conceal it then, my queen?” says Naisi. “A vision I saw last night,” says Deirdri, “namely, that three birds came unto us
 “from Eman of Macha, having three sups of honey in their beaks, and that they left them with “us, and that they took three sups of our blood with them.” “What determination hast thou
 “of that, O princess?” says Naisi. “It is,” says Deirdri, “that Fergus comes unto us with message
 “of peace from Conor; for more sweet is not honey than the message of peace of the false man.”
 “Let that by,” says Naisi, “Fergus is long in the port, and go, Ardan, to meet him, and bring “him with thee.”—Ardan moves forward to where Fergus was, and bestowed kisses dearly and earnestly on himself and his two sons together with him, and thus he said: “My affection be unto you,
 “O, dear companions!” says he, and after that he asked of them the tales of Erin, and these they told him; and thereafter they came to where Naisi, Ainli and Deirdri were, and these bestowed many kisses on Fergus with his sons, and they enquired of them the tales of Erin. “The best tales I have,” says Fergus, are “that Connor hath sent us under “condition and guaranty for you.” “It is not meet “for them to go thither,” says Deirdri, “for great-

α τζαζερνας φειν αν Αλβαν, μα τζαζερνας Concobair an Eirinn. Η φειρ ην ούτταφ
 'νά ζαε ηζο, αρ φερζυφ, όη η ηεμαβηηη δο ηεε, ζε μαο μορ α ηαε νο α ηζε, μια βφαρεο α ούτταφ φειν ζαε λαε. Αφ φηρ
 ηη αρ Ναςη, όη η ανηφα ηοη φειν Εηηε νο
 Αλβα, ζε μοο δο ζεβυηη αν Αλβαιη, νο αν Εηηηη. Αφ οαζεη οββη α οοη ηοηφα, αρ φερζυφ, αφ οαζεη έεοηα, αρ Ναςη, αεαφ ηαεαηαο ηεε ζο η'Εηηηη. Νη δο οεοηη Δεηη.

* The whole conversation here must convince every unprejudiced person that Eiri, not Alba, was the native country of the sons of Usnach. Away then with the conceit, that "Usnach was lord of Etha;" whereas only the territory about Loch Eitche seems to have been the appanage of maintenance given by the king of Alba to the sons of Usnach. I deem it necessary here to give the inflexions of the words Eirne and Alba. Every noun in the ζαεοηηε, or Irish language, must be considered as having three states, viz. 1. the simple, or general; 2. the articulate; and 3. the aspirate. The cases are five, viz. the nominative, genitive, dative, accusative, (always the same with the nominative) and the vocative. The simple state of Eirne is nom. Eirne, gen. Eirneann, dat. Eirinn, acc. Eirne, voc. Α Eirne. The articulate and aspirate states of these words Eirne and Alba, coincide, neither admitting the article an
 in

“er is their own sway in Alba,* than the sway of “Conor in Erin.” “The nativity is better than “every thing,” says Fergus, “for uncheering to “a person, however great his prosperity or power,
 “if he sees not his dear nativity each day.” “True
 “it is,” says Naisi, “for dearer to me is Eiri than “Alba, though more should I obtain in Alba than “in Erin.” “You may be confident in going with me,” says Fergus. “We have confidence truly,” says Naisi, “and we will go with you to Erin.”
 It was not with the consent of Deirdri that Naisi

ex-

in the nominative case, while the names of all other countries do. Articulate and aspirate states: nom. E<sub>1</sub>ne, gen. na h E<sub>1</sub>ne-ann and n' E<sub>1</sub>ne-ann, dat. o' E<sub>1</sub>nn and so h E<sub>1</sub>nn, acc. E<sub>1</sub>ne, roc. a E<sub>1</sub>ne. Simple state: nom. Alba, gen. Alban, dat. Albain, acc.
 Alba, roc. Alba. Articulate and aspirate states:
nom. Alba, gen. na h Alban and n' Alban, dat.
 o' Albain and so h Albain, acc. Alba, roc. a Alba. It may be said, however, that these words, taken in an emphatic or fondling sense, will admit sometimes, but rarely, to be joined with an article in the nominative case; and then the nominative, datice,
accusative, and vocative cases will be the same, viz.
 E<sub>1</sub>nn and Albain; as an E<sub>1</sub>nn se a<sub>1</sub>ne, this
Ireland of ours; an Albain se a<sub>1</sub>ne, this Albain of ours. Hence has arisen the usual manner of writing Albain, or Albion, and Eirin, as nominatives in English

Dějnytope a dubajnt N'ajj na b'pjačpa f'jn, acaq do b'j aza' zojnmoqz zo m'or um a' dol ne ferzuq, acaq čuz ferzuq a b'pjačar ann f'jn, dā mbejtoj'f f'jn E'jneann anbar n-agajō, nač bu fejn'oto' d'ob' ē, ōjn n'j ba' o'jon f'jač, no clojōem, no cačbār do nečē do b'jač ann būn n-agajō acaq m'j' l'j. Žl'f f'jn f'jn, ar N'ajj, acaq nacatōmajone le at zo h'E'jnyj.

Rugadar aq an o'jōčē f'jn zo majōjn ar na m'āpač, acaq čuadar m'ar a' pač a longa, acaq do čuadar ar m'uj' acaq m'oryb'ajze, zo t'āngadar zo d'ūnbhōrajz, acaq d'p'heč Dējnytope tar a' h-aj' ar č'p'čajb' Žl-ban, acaq k' ēō a' d'ubajnt; mo č'jon dujt a č'jn ūō' f'ojn, acaq aq ole l'jom d'p'hāzba'jl, ōjn aq' a'bjm do čuaj, acaq do chalaphujnt,
 acaq do m'āga m'j'ncotāčā caen'āylne, acaq do čulčaj tar'ne-māčā tačb-uaj'ne, acaq aq bež do l'č'gemar a' leq d'p'hāzba'jl acaq a d'ubajnt an lačō ann:

Jm'nyj

* From this down to "and she raised the strain," is omitted in the extract given in the report of the committee expressed those words, and she continued greatly to oppose his going with Fergus; and Fergus did then pledge his solemn word, and said, “If all the men “of Eirin were against you, it would avail them “not; for no protection would shield, or sword or “helmet be, to any that would be against you, and “I with you.” “True it is,” says Naisi, “and “we will go with you to Eirin.”

They bore away that night until the morning of the next day, and they went where lay their ships, and they set out to sea, and over the great main ’till they came to the mansion of Barach; and Dierdri looked after her at the regions of Alba,* and thus she said: “My affection unto you, yon eastern “land, and grieved am I to leave you; for delight“ful are thy harbours and thy bays, and thy dear “beauteous plains of soft verdure, and thy sprightly “green-sided hills; and little did we need to leave “thee!” and she raised the strain:

G

“ Delightful

mittee of the Highland society; they have, however, marked the omissions with a few dots, without any other notice of it.

Խնույն շին, առ շին աս իօրն, Չիկա ըսոս ա ի՛ նգանտայծ;
 մո՛ճա շշուփայնն ելլէ յլե,
 մունա շշուփայնն լե Ն՛ախօ.

Խնույն

3 The meaning of this line has been utterly mistaken by doctor Donald Smith, evidently and acknowledgedly the best Gaelic scholar in the Highland Society in 1805. This arose from his only having a slight acquaintance with ancient Irish manuscripts, of which, it seems, his countrymen have made some valuable collections latterly, and with which we are glad to find them eager to be acquainted. That the Highland Society is possessed of valuable Irish manuscripts, their plates of blazoned head-letters, and fac simile specimens put beyond a doubt. Doctor Smith has proved in many instances, excluding his exposition of the little poem before us, that he had made considerable progress towards a knowledge of the correct and cultivated old language of Ireland. He was, however, led astray in the present instance by the contracted form of the aspirated dative ի-նգանտայծ. He took the first or upright stroke of the aspiration ի for an l, not observing, as the plate exhibits, an j written underneath the last or down stroke, and over it a bar, like an hyphen, for an n. This literary criticism would be nugatory, if it tended not to prove, that their ablest Gaelic scholars of modern date are, with all their industry, yet in noviciate. This error led doctor Smith to form a word not known in the language, viz. լնգանտայծ; and as լնն (making լննայծ)

- “ Delightful land, yon eastern land, “ Alba with its wonders ;*
 “ I would not hither thence depart, “ Did I not come with Naisi.

“ Lovely

Лунз)б in the dative plural) signifies a pool or lake, and as it had some literal likeness in the three first letters to what would be a fine natural curiosity, a lake, it was taken as such, and lakes are in the doctor's translation, for our wonders, meaning GRAND natural curiosities. This mistake is, however, a mere violence to language ; but the other mistakes, so very numerous in this simple poem, are very gross violations of sense and diction, as well as of the highest destination of language, the sentiment of poetry, and its upholding metre. The other literal and constructive mistakes of doctor Smith are so numerous, as would swell this note beyond all reasonable limits ; it must therefore be observed, generally, for the remainder, that the best informed modern Galic scholar, doctor Smith, knew little of old Irish versification—nothing of its metre. There are not many instances of any poetry in our language not written in quatrains, or stanzas of four lines, concluding a determined sense. In ancient manuscripts the judgment of the reader, and his knowledge of prosody, must be his guidance and direction, both for sense and metre ; for as beautiful transcription was laborious, tedious and expensive, and fine vellum (the material on which they wrote) very scarce and costly, the scribes abridged the one and spared the other as much as they could. Hence lines

Խինյի Ըն ղՅՕՁՅՂ 'Կ Ըն ղԽԻ; Խինյի առ Ըն օԿ ա ՇԽԻ; Խինյի Խինյ Զոսյնեա՛ւ շե, աԶս ղինյի Ըն Տսյնե.

Չ շօյլլ

lines are not always terminated where metre would require, and where pathetic repetition is necessary, as the reader's judgment is depended upon, the repetition is omitted, and the next line proceeds without interruption.—Of what school-boys had by heart, it was but necessary to give a hint; taste supplied the rest. See the first instance in the present poem:

Չ շխյլլ շւան! Օն ա շխյլլ շւան!

O, wood of Kone! O, wood of Kone!

In the copy before doctor Smith, there was no more of this line than Շխյլլ շխւան.—But if he had any knowledge of the real metre of the language, he could not but know what the rest of the stanza required, and he would of course supply the pathetic repetition of the exclamation. In fact, ye modern Albanian Highland Scots, of noble Irish extraction, roused as your very respectable genus is in defence of the separating imposture of its late champion, the bombastically sublime Mr. Mac Pherson, ye are seri studiosum, late learned students, in Irish. Your silly, perverse adherence to falsehood could alone provoke this animadversion from us, whom could you deprive of history and literature, you yourselves

- “ Lovely is Dunfy and Dunfin ; “ Lovely the Dun over them ;
 “ Lovely is the Isle of Drayno, too,
 “ And lovely is the Dun of Suvno.

“ O ! wood

selves would have none left, nor the name of a people to boast. The following is our simple versification of this simple poem: comparative facts, in evident cases, are irrefragable proofs. Let the literal translations, between you and us, be the indubitable standard :

*The English Versification, from the literal Translation,
by Mr. WILLIAM LEAHY.*

Delightful land ! yon eastern clime !
 Fair Alba with its scenes sublime ;—
 Its charming plains I ne'er would leave,
 But that I come with Naisi brave.

From Dunfy and Dunfin to fly,
 Mansions belov'd ! I'll ever sigh !
 The fort that rears its tow'ring pile—
 Swyno's high walls, and Drayno's isle.

O wood of Cona ! in thy bow'rs
 Did Anly spend his sweetest hours ;—
 In Alba's west too short my stay !
 For Naisi call'd me soon away.

O valed

2l éostl éuan! on a éostl éuan!
 Súf tciġeatò 2hinnle, mo muar;
 fú ġajmo hómfa nó bġ ann,
 k Naisi in jayčar Alban.

Glenn Layde! ón in Glenn Layde!
 do éodluynn fám erriatò éajni;
 iayc 'aġ oġ-fheoġ k fasil brujc,
 fú hġ mo éuro in Glenn Layde.

Glenn

O vale of Lay!—far now it lies!
 Where balmy slumbers clos'd my eyes:
 The luscious flesh of badger rare,
 And fish and ven'son were my fare.

Adieu to Masan's verdant vale!
 Where herbage sweet perfum'd the gale;
 My cares were often lull'd to rest,
 Enroll'd in Masan's grassy vest.

With woe my bosom Archay fills;
 The valley fair of flow'ry hills!
 No youth more sprightly there was seen
 Than Naisi, of majestic mien.

O Ety's vale! retreat divine!
 Where first a house uprear'd was mine;
 Amid thy groves, with golden gleam,
 The sun spreads wide his rising beam.

No

“ O! wood of Kone, O! wood of Kone, “ Whither, alas! Ainli would resort;
 “ Too short I deem my stay there,
 “ With Naisi in the west of Alba.

“ Vale of Laith, O! in the vale of Laith
 “ I used to sleep under my soft coverlets; “ Fish and venison, and the delicious prime of “ badger,*
 “ Was my repast in the vale of Laith.

“ Vale

No more I'll rove in Daro's vale—
 I love each claimer of that dale:
 How sweet the cuckoo's melting strain
 From bending bough, o'er Daro's plain!

Farewel to Drayno's sounding shore!
 O'er crystal sand whose waters roar;
 These charming scenes I ne'er would leave,
 But with my love—my Naisi brave.

The stile of this poem and of Colum Kill's farewel to Aran are so strikingly alike, that we must allow them at least of equal antiquity, which was the beginning or middle of the sixth of the æra of our salvation. See Colum Kill's poem in the observations at the conclusion of this tale.

* Doctor Smith, because βαυζέ, to boil, had a close similarity to βαυζε, the gen. from the nominative βαυος a bad-

Glenn Mhaíán! ón Glenn Mhaíán!
 árd a chneán, gel a chaíán;
 do ghníomh coúlad corraé,
 óf mbeir monzáé Mhaíán.

Glenn Uíéáin! ón Glenn Uíéáin!
 fa hé an Glenn óíneé Druiméáin;
 noé an b'ualléa fer a aife,
 no mo Naife an Glenn Uíéáin.

Glenn Eíccé! ué ón Glenn Eíccé!
 ann do éógbaí mo éé-d-éíé;
 áluinn a fíod íar n-éíccé buaife íríne Glenn Eíccé.

Glenn

a badger, translates this passage, "the choice of the chase prepared;" whereas it means what we have given in our translation. Doctor Smith must have been fastidious respecting the idea of badger's flesh being considered a luxury by a lady of such high rank as Deirdri; but then he should also loath her praise of hart's-tongue, &c. The ancients were conversant with Nature; she was their guide and model, and they copied her with all fidelity. Badger was formerly considered a very great.

“ Vale of Masan, O! vale of Masan ;
 “ High its hart’s-tongue, fair its stalks ;
 “ We enjoy’d a rocking sleep
 “ O’er the grassy harbour of Masan.

“ Vale of Urchay, O! vale of Urchay !
 “ It was the straight vale of smooth ridge ;
 “ A man of his age was not more sprightly “ Than my Naisi in the vale of Urchay.

“ Vale of Eiti, alas! O vale of Eiti !
 “ In it I raised my first house ;
 “ Beauteous its wood ;—upon rising,
 “ Delightful resort of the sun is the vale of Eiti.

H

“ Vale

great delicacy, and badger’s ham is still the delight of many an epicure. The numerous other errors in the translation of doctor Smith may be observed on comparison with ours. The vales here mentioned, are still known by their ancient appellations: Glenurchay gives title to the eldest son of the house of Braidalbain; he is stiled Lord Glenurchay. The word ṽúñ certainly signifies fort, fastness, mansion or tower; any place shut in, as were all the habitations of our ancient chieftains.

Glenn dá Ruad! ón Glenn dá Ruad!
 mo éion gaé aen fhear dár dual;
 aq bhinn suir cuasce an éraib éruim,
 an an mbhinn óq Glenn dá Ruad.

Inniuín Droisín óq tréin trág;
 inniuín uisce óq gairmín glan;
 noéa ttrucfain aqde de,
 mun' ttriccinn lem' inniuine.

Al h-ajéle na laeide sin pancatar so dún bhonnatg, acaq do éoiréir bhonnacé teópa roe, so dsl acaq so d'éira d' fheirgus con
 a macuib acaq do Chloim Uirneacé mur aén mu. Alq ann sin a túbairt bhonnacé so rajó fleó aqse an oiréill fheirgus, acaq sur éir do a fágbaíl no so ceatad í.
 O d' éualad fheirgus sin, do rinnaó noé-mall corera de ó a báir so a bonn, acaq aq éó no rajó, óle do rinnsi, a bhon-natg, fleó d' fhuasíl oim-fa, ocaq Con-éubar

* A proof of his sincerity, and a dread that if he did not accompany the children of Usnach, something would be attempted, which must, in his opinion, be prevented

“ Vale of the two Roes! O vale of the two “ Roes!

“ My love each man to whom it is inheritance ;
“ Sweet is the cuckoo’s note on bending bough,
“ On the cliff over the vale of the two Roes.

“ Dear is Drayno, of resounding shore ;
“ Dear its waters over pure sand ;
“ I would not thence at all come,
“ Except I would come with my love.”

After these lays, they reached the mansion of Barach, and Barach impressed kisses thrice repeated, affectionately and eagerly on Fergus, with his sons, and on the children of Usnach, and on Deirdri along with them. And then Barach said that he had a feast prepared for Fergus, and that it was solemn Injunction on him not to leave it without partaking of it. When Fergus heard this, he became a reddened crimson bulk from head to foot,* and thus he said: “ Ill done it is of you, O!
“ Barach, to ask me to a feast, and that Conor “ exacted prevented by his presence, which he thinks to supply by the mission of his sons. Barach’s conduct here is full proof of his concert with Conor, in the design of premeditated treachery.

éubair ari tabairte mo bhréirí orim-sa, mur
 a*q* tae-sa é*u*e-*u*i*n*i zo h-*E*i*n*i*n*i, dá m-baó
 d' a*u*té*e* no do íó dá*n*i a*g* t*e*e*t* a n-*o*i*n*, clann U*u*i*n*i*g* do é*u*i zo h-*E*i*n*a*n*i *g*ha*e*a.
 Cui*n*i*g*í *f*ó *g*e-*sa*b t*u*, ar bo*r*na*e*, muna
 t*e*g*e* t*u* do é*a*i*t*e*n*i na *f*le*u*de. D' *f*ha-*u*i-g
*f*e*r*g*u*i do *N*a*u*e e*r*eó do d*e*na*n*i le*g* an
*f*le*u*de? do d*e*na*n*i, ar *D*e*u*i*o*i, do ro*g*a a*g*a-sa, m*e* U*u*i-*e*e do é*r*e*g*io*n* no an
*f*hleó, aca*q* *g*u*r* eó*r*a d*u*i*t* an *f*hleó úo do t*r*e*g*e*n*, 'ná clann U*u*i-*e*e do t*r*e*g*e*n*;
 n*í* é*r*e*g*ia-*u*o*sa* i*u*d, ar *f*é, ó*n*i cui*n*i-*g*io mo d*o*a-g ma*e*, ió*e*n, Ma*n*i *g*i*n*i, aca*q*, bu*n*i-e bo*r*bu*a*d leo zo h-*E*i-*n*a-*n*i *g*ha*e*a. Dar mo b*r*na*e*ar, ar *N*a*e*u*e*, n*í* be*g* h*n*i-e *g*i*n*i u*a*e, ó*n*i n*í* n*e*e e*g*le do éo-*g*a-*n*i *g*i-*n*i-e ma*n*i a*e*t *g*i-*n*i *f*e-*n*i; aca*q* do *g*lu-*a*g ro-*n*i-e do*n* lá-*e*a-*n*i, ma-g- le n*e* *f*e-*n*g m*ó*o-*n*i, aca*q* do le-*n*a-*d*a-r *u*i-*n*le, aca*q* *u*i-*o*a-n, aca*q* *D*e-*u*i-*o*i-e, aca*q* d*o*a-g ma*e*
*f*e-*r*g*u*i é, aca*q* do *f*h-*á*g-*b*a-*d*a-r *f*e-*r*g*u*i zo dúbaé

Deirdri was not an initiate in the school of valour, or she would not make such argument. She was,
 however, a quick observer of natural conduct. Nature seems to work stronger than mystical initiation with “exacted my solemn word from me, soon as ever

 “I should arrive in Erin, whether I should have “night or day, on coming from eastward, to send “unto him, to Eman of Macha, the children of “Usnach.” “I lay you under solemn banns,” says Barach, “if you come not to partake of the “feast.” Fergus asked of Naisi what he would do with the feast? “Do thus,” says Deirdri, “you “have your choice to forsake the children of “Usnach or the feast; * while it is more meet to “forsake that feast than to forsake the children “of Usnach.” “I will not forsake them,” says
 he, “for I will send my two sons, Illan the fair,
 “and Buini the ruthless red, with them to Eman
 “of Macha.” “Upon my word,” says Naisi,
 “we think not that little from you, for it is not “any other person that defended us ever, but “ourselves;” and he moved off from the place with great wrath; and Ardan, and Deirdri, and the two sons of Fergus followed him, and they left Fergus sad and sorrowful after them. However

Naisi too, when he departs in sullen dignity, leaving Fergus to his vows and injunctions. Human nature was alive to feeling formerly as much as now, with all our affected refinement.

túbac dóbrónac d'á n-éif; s'ídeò ba deimhne
le fheirgus co n-a éloim da n-déacóif olléasgíò Eirenn an áen éomairle naé ceiccead doib a ceumairce f'éin do íarúgadó.

Iméuamac n-Uíneé do gluaifeoan íompa an aiféimha zaéa comairce, acas a túbairce D'éiríde nju do béimh cómairle máe d'íob
a élan n-Uíneí, s'ion go n-déicéan íob í, eiféó
í an éomairle ím a ígáim, an N'acfe, a tá,
an íadól go Raélaím, íeíeíim acas D'ubáim acas íhanamám ann go ceicceó fheirgus an íhleó, acas a í comall b'íeíeíe d' fheirgus ím, acas a í íadúgadó íaeíáil d'íob í. N'í dénam an éomairle ím, an N'acfe, acas an élan n'fheirgus: acas do íadú élan n'fheirgus íup b' ole an íimhíim do b' íae
a ída íéim, naé beíó ímca comairce do dénam, s'ion go m-beíó cómairle éloim n-Uíneí do íáimáib ím a ííaradó, acas íof b'íaeíeíe fheirgus ímáile ím. Ué! a í ímáíeíe íeíe an

† Isle of Rachlin still exists. It cannot be said that it is a visionary island, or our account of it fabulous, though we speak of it in a poetic tale, founded on fact. But any thing, however solemn or serious, asserted in the history

ever it was a confidence with Fergus and his sons, that if the high provincial states of Eirin would enter into one council, they would not be able to break through their protection particularly.

As to the story of the sons of Usnach, they set forward by the shortness of every way, and Deirdri said unto them, "I would myself give you good advice, although you may not put it in practice." "What advice is that, O! queen?" says Naisi. "It is," says she, "to go to Rachlin,* between Eirin and Alba, and to abide there until Fergus partake of the feast; this will be a fulfilling of his word for Fergus, and it will be a prolonging of life for you." "We will not practice that advice," says Naisi. And the children of Fergus said, that bad was her confidence in themselves, as if they would not be able to give protection, even though as good hands as the children of Usnach were not of their side, and having still more the plighted faith of Fergus with them. "Alas! luck-
" less

history of our native island, must be ridiculously visionary—God help us! and yet, unfortunately, we are the oldest literary people in Europe.—We will prove the fact very shortly.

an m-bhējēn qm fhep̄gusa, an Dhēp̄one, acas sup ēp̄ējē qm an fhleō, acas do pne an laejō an:

Maip̄ ēānje a n-onn ējō, vl,
 Re bhācān nje Rōjē pō njn;
 Nōc a n-dēnfa acēt oēān de,
 Uē! q pō ēp̄āō pem' ēnojde.

Mo ēnojde 'na ēaejō cūnīajō
 Ta noēt, mo nōn p̄ūdajj!
 Mo nuān, a niaca majē,
 Thāncator būn t̄p̄uglajē.

Na h-abajj, qm, a Dhēp̄one ōjan,
 U ben q ājne nā an ēp̄jan;
 Nj ēp̄ucfaō fep̄gus anajj, Cugajne ēum an mjlajō.

fa

* And that, i.e. when. I have left the reader to his own judgment in many idiomatic phraseologies, but there is one which many may think tautology, when in our language it is emphatic expression—such are the phrases “spoke and said;” and after giving the speech, expressing, “says he,” which is quite correct in our language, equivalent to what in others is expressed by “so he spoke.” ὡς ἔφατ'. Sic dixit, &c.

“ less (woeful) it is to have come with that plighted “ faith of Fergus!” says Deirdri, “ and that he * “ has forsaken us for a feast;” and she then delivered this lay :

Deirdri. “ ’Tis woeful to have come from east“ ward, however dear,
 “ Upon the faith of the very unsteady† son of Roy ;
 “ I will not utter but lamentation on its account.
 “ Alas ! it is excessive anguish to my heart !”

“ My heart—a lobe of grief
 “ Is to night, my great sorrow :
 “ Ah ! my woe, my noble youths,
 “ The fulness of your days hath arrived.”

Naisi. “ Say not so, O ! Deirdri severe ;
 “ O ! woman, more beauteous than the sun :‡
 “ Fergus would not eastward come “ To us, for our destruction.”

I

Deirdri.

† The original word may also signify very active,
very energetic, very powerful, very vigorous, &c.

‡ Mr. M’Pherson has this expression, like every other fine expression that is peculiar here, or any where else, in our compositions. An omission of expressions
 of

fa naer, aq faoa hóm túb, 2l mac a áille Uímhé, Teét ó Albain an fheoir gairé,
 faoa buq buan a bjeimairé.

2l h-ajle na laeide qm táncatar nómpa, 30 qm-éarri na foraire ari qhjad qmairé, acas do fhanDéirde d'á n-éir q an n-glenn,
 acas nó éir a codlad úirre ann, acas nó áiré

of original beauty, should not be expected from Mr. M'Pherson. He is greatly judicious in Selection and Rejection. He selects beauties well, and with equal taste he rejects what may appear to modern taste exuberant, and abundantly supplies the deficiency by inventions of his own.

*The English Versification, from the literal Translation,
 by Mr. WILLIAM LEAHY.*

Deirdri. From east, how woeful to depart!
 The thought with anguish wrings my heart:
 Though true the son of Roy may be,
 To hold his plighted word to thee.

O! ne'er shall sorrow leave my breast,—
 No night shall give me soothing rest:
 Alas! brave youths, with grief I say,
 You rash approach your gloomy day!

Deirdri. “Woe, and alas! I deem it too far for you,

“O, darling sons of Usnach!

“To have come from Alba of the rank grass;

“Long shall last its live-long woe!

After this lay, they came on to Fincarn* watchtower, on the mountain of Fuad; and Deirdri loitered after them in the vale, and her sleep fell upon her

Naisi. Nymph, brighter than the sun's bright beam,
Why thus severe, in woe you seem?
Fergus would ne'er from westward come,
Basely to lure us to our doom.

Deirdri. Oh! Usna's sons, of graceful mien,
'Tis sad to leave fair Alba green!—
'Tis lasting—never-ending woe
From Alba's flow'ry plains to go!

* Dr. Smith would have called this Fingal's heap, ha! ha! as he called Dunfin, Fingal's Tower. Gracious God! we never had a Fingal! and Fin, the son of Cumhal, so denominated, lived not for near three centuries after the transactions here detailed. Fuad mountain still bears the name in the county of Antrim. Finn (F)INN in the Irish language, signifies fair, literally; just, figuratively; also ancient, romantic, as F)IN-F)E)l
an ams̄ Naeke Dēnne jar na fāgbārl o'ā n-ēk, acas no fōll tar a as mur a nas̄ Dēnne as em̄s̄ as a cotlad, acas do fhaynas̄ o, crēo f' ān fhannys a n̄gajm?

 cotlad do b̄j om, an Dēnne, acas do éonayne aslins̄ ann. Crēo j an aslins̄ fm̄, an Naeke? a tā, an f̄j, zan a éenn an Jollann fhinn, acas a éenn an bhuyne boyb nuad, acas zan congnaim bhuyne boyb nuad
 n̄b̄s̄, acas congnaim Jollann fhinn n̄b̄, acas do n̄ne an laes̄o :

Tnuas̄ an tays̄j tarfas̄ òam,
 U éētar fheta fhinn-glān,
 Zan éenn uas̄o an éētar òe,
 'S zan congnaim fm̄ ne éēs̄le.

Noc

an ancient romantic story, &c. We have many places in Ireland, denominated Suidē f̄inn, signifying Finn's watch-tower. It may also signify the speculative seat of a man of chase; so that it is not always restricted to Finn M'Cumhal.

* This indicates the retinue to have been numerous.
 Every one knows that dreams and credited visions were in vogue with the ancients;—many an elegant poem have they embellished in our language.

her there; and Naisi perceived that Deirdri was left behind them;* and he returned backward where Deirdri was rising out of her sleep, and he asked of her: "Why didst thou tarry, princess?" says he. "A sleep that was upon me," says Deirdri, "and I saw a dream in it." "What was that dream?" says Naisi. "It is," says she, "his head not on Illan the fair, and his head on Buini the ruthless red; and the assistance of Buini the ruthless red not with you, and the assistance of Illan the fair with you." And she composed the lay:

Deirdri. "Sad is the vision that hath appeared
 " in a dream to me,
 " O! four† stately, fair, bright youths!
 " His head not on one of you in it,
 " And not the assistance of a man with another."

Naisi.

† The three sons of Usnach, and Fergus's faithful son, Illan the fair. How dramatic this introduction to the treachery of Bunó, the ruthless red, according to the conceived opinions of ancient time, than which, I presume, the more studied contrivances of modern art, are not more judicious, delicate, or interesting.

Նօժ ա շահ Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր, Ա յոյր ալայն Ե՛ր Ե՛ր,
 Ներն Ե՛ր ինչ Ե՛ր շահ շահ,
 Այն շահայն յոյր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր.

Ե՛ր Ե՛ր յոյր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր,
 Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր, Նօ յոյր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր,
 Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր.

Ե՛ր Ե՛ր ա շահ յոյր Ե՛ր,
 Ե՛ր Ե՛ր ա շահ յոյր Ե՛ր,
 Ա շահ յոյր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր, Նօժ ա շահ ա շահ շահ.

Ա յոյր

*The English Versification, from the literal Translation,
 by Mr. WILLIAM LEAHY.*

Deirdri. O! hear my visionary tale!—
 I saw your bodies breathless—pale;
 Extended headless on the ground,
 And none to offer aid around!

Naisi. Fair virgin, of resplendent mien,
 By thee, but evils, nought is seen:
 May from thy ruby lips what flows
 Of vengeance fall upon our foes.

Deirdri.

Naisi. “Thy mouth pronounceth not but evil, “Thou damsel, beauteous, incomparable!
 “The vengeance of thy ruby delicate lips
 “Fall on the furious—hateful foreigners.”

Deirdri. “I would prefer the misfortune of “every one,”

Says Deirdri, “without dark design,
 “Before your misfortune, O! gentle three,
 “With whom I traversed sea and much land!”

“I see his head on Buini,
 “Since it is his life that is longer;—
 “His head on Buini the ruthless red;
 “It is not with me to-night, that it is not plenitude of “sorrow.”

After

Deirdri. Then, said the dame, I'd better know,
 That half mankind were sunk in woe;
 Than you, renoun'd and generous three,
 With whom I've travell'd land and sea.

I saw his head on Buno sole,—
 His life secure—his body whole;—
 On Buno sole, the ruthless red,
 With sorrow, I beheld his head!

2l h-ajéle na lajeðe fñi tãncatar rómpra
 zo h-2lrdmaça, aq ann fñi a tubajre Dêj-dre, do éjm nêull 'q an aep acas q nêull fola é, acas doðerajñ cónajre majè ðjòs, a élanñ Ujñjg, ar fj. Crêð j an éomajre fñi, ar Naeje? Dul zo dun Delgajñ mur aqfñl Cúculajñ, nò zo ccajèð ferquf an fhleð, acas beje ajñ éumajre Chonéulajñ ajñ egla cejze Chonéobajñ. O nãc fñl egla opujñ, nj ðenam an Chonajre fñi, ar Nafj, acas do jñe Dêjrdre an lajèð zo fjòq:

2l, Naeje! feuça an nêl
 Do éju funna 'q an aep!
 Do éruça úf Eñajñ uajene fuar-nêl fola for-majðe.

Ghavaq bjòðgað dre 'q an nêl
 Do éju funna 'q an aep;
 Samalca ne epú fola, 2ln nêl uatmar jmçona.

Do

* This is the very thing that suggested the idea of the address to the moon, to Mr. M'Pherson, as Deirdri's choice

After this lay they came on to Ardsallech,* (the height of Willows,) and then Deirdri said to Naisi, "I see a cloud in the sky,† and it is a cloud of blood; and I would give you good advice, O, children of Usnach!" "What advice is that?" says Naisi. "To go to Dundalgan where Cuchullan is, 'till Fergus partake of the feast, and to be under the safe-guard of Cuchullan, for fear of the treachery of Connor." "Since fear is not upon us, we will not practise that advice," says Naisi. And Deirdri raised the strain:

Deirdri. "O, Naisi! view the cloud
 "That I here see in the sky!
 "I see over Eman green
 "A chilling cloud of blood tinged red."

"I have caught alarm from the cloud
 "I see here in the sky;
 "It is like a gore of blood,
 "The cloud terrific—very thin."

K

"I give

choice in the preliminary story suggested the expression of "his hair like the raven's wing."

Do béimín cómáimle béét,
 Do macaib úilne Uíneé;
 Gan vol go h-Éimáin a noét,
 Trí a fíil oíab do gúafaét.

Racáimío-ne go dun Delgan
 Mú a fíil Cú na ceirdeá;
 Tríeam a máraé a n-deí,
 Mú aén 'f an Chú éomídeí.

Al dúbáim Naeíe tríe fheimí
 Le Déimíe gáíta gíuaó-déimí,
 O náe íl eíla oíme,
 N'í dénam an éomáimle.

Do b' annam ím íamí íomíe,
 Al ua íacímáí Rúóíamíe,
 Gan an m-beíe aín aen íeól deí;
 Míe í tuíá, a Naeíe!

211

* The Irish File forgot his plan, as it would appear to modern criticism; but in fact the poetic reciter speaks in his own character occasionally, least the audience should forget that he was repeating composition. This is

" I give an advice of wisdom,
 " To you, O! darling sons of Usnach;
 " Not to go to Eman this night,
 " For all the trouble that is on you."

" We will go to Dundalga,
 " Where the hero of arts resides;
 " We will come to-morrow from the southward,
 " Together with the hero most expert."

Naisi* said, through wrath,
 To Deirdri, wise, of blooming countenance,
 " Since fear rests not upon us,
 " We will not practise the advice."

" Seldom were we ever before,
 " Thou accomplished grandson of Rory,
 " Without our being of one accord on every " occasion,
 " I and you, O, Naisi!"

" On

is not according to the approved rules of Greek and Latin drama, but it is a peculiar and appropriate usage of the Irish.

211 lā tug ʒananān euac,
 Chuḡamḡa ʒo nač nōbuatō,
 Nʒ beḡta ʒa um' aḡajō tē,
 21 dēn̄m leat, a Naye!

21 h-ajēle

* Mananan the son of Lear, the wide-spread exten-siveness, usually written in the genitive case, LIR, the figurative name of the SEA. Mana was the old name of the ISLE of MAN. The character, here mentioned, was a famed CARTHAGINIAN merchant, who made this island his great depot: his real name is obscured in the glare of enchanted and fabulous story diffused around it, and he is called by the tale writers of old, ʒananān, mac l̄m, Sʒōē na ccruac, “the “man of MANAN, the son of the sea, the super-human “being of the Headlands.” Sʒē ʒajē, is a blast of wind; but Sʒōē ʒaejē is a super-human or spiritual being of the wind: this is the original of Mr. M<sup>c</sup>Pherson’s spirit of the wind. Sluaḡ Sʒōē, the fairy host; ben Sʒōē, a fairy nymph in old Irish mythology. ʒac l̄m ōn accēn, or ʒac l̄m t̄ajmḡ accēn, is the son of extensiveness from the ocean, or the son of exten-siveness who came from afar. Accēn, from afar, is derived from a, from, and cjan, far, in space or time.
 This is the real root of the Greek Ωκεανός. Our ancestors were much taken with the marvellous, and any thing brought by the son of the sea was considered miraculous.

† Deirdri’s sentiment here alludes to her and Naisi’s first acquaintancē. Every classical reader will recollect, on reading

“ On the day that Mananan* brought the cup
 “ To me, with powerful property,
 “ You would not be against me then,
 “ I say unto you, O, Naisi!”†

After

reading this, Jupiter and Juno's intercourse and conversation on Ida; but in ancient Irish compositions there is nothing borrowed. Nature is the model, and modesty is veiled in the garb of enchantment.

The English Versification, from the literal Translation,
by Mr. WILLIAM LEAHY.

Deirdri. O, Naisi! hither turn thine eye,
 And view yon cloud upon the sky!—
 Direct above Emania green,
 A cloud of blood is dreadful seen!

The awful sight my soul alarms,—
 A certain sign of pending harms!
 The border's of a bloody hue!—
 So thin that I can see it through!

O, Usnach's sons! of matchless might,
 Go not to Eman's wails to-night;—
 O let my well-judg'd word prevail!
 With rest, your weary limbs regale.

U h-aele na laeide gin gluahe-dan rompa zo h-Einain Mhaea. U elann Ughis, an Deirdre, a ta comarta agamsa oibhe, ma ta Concoban an t'j feille do denain orab.
 Ca comarta gin, an Maehe? Ma leigter sib'j fan t'j a ffil Concoban, acas Mahe Ulad, n'j ffil Concoban an t'j feille do denain orab, acas ma 'f a t'j na Crae-bemaide cuighoeter sib, atá fe an t'j feille do denain orab zo deijn. Rancatan jan gin zo h-Einain Mhaea, acas do baine-dan bejm hae-rojinn 'f an doras, acas do fhegahn

an

We'll to Dundalgan turn our course,
 Where lives the chief of conq'ring force :
 When day—from south we'll press the plain,
 With great Cuchullan in our train.

Naisi. Then, Naisi said, with angry air,
 To Deirdri, wise and Heav'nly fair,
 Our souls are not depress'd with fear,—
 We'll give to the advice no ear.

Deirdri. Thou fam'd descent from Rory's line,
 Ere this, your will was always mine ;—
 Naisi, before, obey'd my word,—
 Before, we were of one accord :

When

After this lay they moved forward to Eman of Macha. "O, children of Usnach!" says Deirdri, "I have a signal for you, if Conor is on design to commit treachery on you." "What signal is that?" says Naisi. "If you be let into the mansion in which are Conor and the nobles of Ulster, Conor is not on design to commit treachery on you; and if it be to the mansion of the Red Branch* you shall be sent, he is on design to commit treachery on you for a certainty. They arrived after this at Eman of Macha, and they struck a loud stroke of the hand-wood† at the

When Mananan the goblet brought,
And made me drink the pow'ful draught;—
When Naisi first receiv'd my hand,—
He would not then my will withstand.

* This was the college of ancient honor and valour; an order of knighthood, in Ulster, long before any account of like institution can be traced elsewhere. The sons of Usnach were of this order; but as the king was sovereign, he must have the members with him at any grand entertainment; and an exclusion of these youths, on this occasion, must be to prevent revival of affection with their fellows, and forward the designs of treachery.

† Hand-wood. means the rapper.

an d'áiríodh m'c Uí Fhíng, acaí do fhlacnaíđ eia do b'í gan d'oraí. Do h-áiníod do gur ab íad m'c Uí Fhíng, acaí D'áiníod, acaí dá m'ac f'heiríodh do b'í ann. D'áiníod Conéobair a luét f'heiríodh acaí f'heiríodh éiríodh, acaí f'heiríodh d'áiníod, eiríodh do b'í teé na C'raeíodh-ríodh f'a b'íad, no f'a d'íod.
 D'áiníod d'áiníod d'áiníod f'heiríodh ccaíodh Uíad ann, do f'heiríodh uile a f'heiríodh ann. Na 'f' éod, ar Conéobair, beiríodh m'c Uí Fhíng l'íod áiníod.

Í ann f'íod do náíod D'áiníod, do b'í f'heiríodh ma éiríodh f'íod do d'áiníod f'a gan teéodh do h-áiníod, acaí gur ba áiníod d'áiníod eiríodh an tan f'íod f'heiríodh. N'í d'áiníod, ar Iollan f'íod, d'áiníod n'í m'ac d'áiníod do f'íod áiníod ríodh, acaí náíod don C'raeíodhríodh. Do g'heiríodh náíod do teé na C'raeíodh.

† This shows how cautious Connor was to give offence in the first instance. He pretends, but it was malignant pretence, to be anxious for the commodious reception of the sons of Usnach; but it was only to mature his certain vengeance. The youths themselves, at length, seem

the door. The door-keeper answered the sons of Usnach, and asked who was at the door? It was told him that they were the three sons of Usnach and Deirdri, and the two sons of Fergus, that were there. Conor calls his attendants and servants unto him, and asks of them how the house of the Red Branch was circumstanced as to food and as to drink? They said, that if the seven battalions of Ulad would come there they would find their full satiety of food and drink. "If so, then," says Conor, "take the sons of Usnach with you into it."†

Then Deirdri said, "it were better take my counsel not to come to Eman;" and added, that it was meet for them to leave it then itself. "We will not do so," says Illan the fair, "for it is not cowardice or unmanliness that has been ever known of us, and we will go to the Red Branch."

They moved on to the house of the Red Branch, L
and

seem to know this, by refusing refreshment; which Naisi, however, affects to conceal or dissipate by playing at chess with his idol. The very grand, dignified and disinterested affection and resolution maintained here, is seldom pictured elsewhere. This is the moral of the story.

Chraeibe-ruaioe, acas da cuireo luét yretair acas yreoiute leo ann: acas do dasleo bjaða faera, foearnie, acas deoa mera, meiceimla doib, gur bo fubaé fomenmaé jad ule, aét me Uymg acas Dēirome amān; oir nīr eaicedar mōrān bīde no oīge ó niejo a n-ajctīr, acas a n-imeéta ó dūn boirajg go h-ēimān fhaáa.

Uf an fīn a dūbarc Naege, tabraio an ēem eaēm eugajm go n-decamīg d'jmīr.
 Tugaō an ēem eaēm eugca acas do būdar
 aš jmīr.

Uf an fīn d'fīafīrajg Conēobar, eja do gēbajm d'fhiof an mājem a teib nō a dēnam fēn am Dhēirome, oir ma mājem
 m fīl 'f an doīan ben af ūlle 'nā f?

Racāo fēn ann, ar lebarcam, acas bēraō na fēla fīn eugadfa, acas h amīajō do bī fī, ba h-ajca lē Naege nō neé

* The nobles were not yet brought into Conor's schemes, although he must have been dissemblingly sounding their dispositions. But then he was paramour sovereign.

and folk of service and attendance were sent thither with them. And generous and alluring viands, and sprightly exhilarating drinks were supplied unto them, until they were all satisfied and cheerful, but the sons of Usnach and Deirdri alone; for they partook not of much food or drink from the greatness of their journey, and of their moving from the mansion of Barach to Eman of Macha.

And then Naisi said, "bring the polished cabinet unto us that we may go play."—The polished cabinet, was brought unto them, and they were playing.

And then Conor asked, "whom should I find," says he, "to know if her own form and shape live upon Deirdri? for if her own form live upon her, there is not in the world a woman more beautiful than she."

"I myself will go there," says Lavarcam, "and I will bring these tidings unto you."* And so disposed was she, that dearer to her was Naisi than sovereign, and his will must be obeyed; however, he was soothed until his rage rose to its utmost height. The composer shews a capital knowledge of human nature, in his management, throughout this historic tale.

neé esle 's an domán, ónn ba mne lé dul,
 ayn fadó an domáin d'jannod Naeke, acas
 az breje fceola éuge, acas uajó; táyne Lebaréam noimpe zo h-ajm a rajó Naeke acas Déjndre, acas as anlasó do yuajm jad, acas an éenn éaém etanna, acas jad az imne uime, acas do éomibyn do rózagó zo ojl acas zo djéna jad; acas adúbajm, ný majé do gny fíbf, an nýó as mefa le Conéubar do rugaó uajó man, aét Déjdre anáyn, do beje az a h-imne agubó fan an fa: acas as d' fhy an majen a deslb

no

* All things belonging to a great personage of old, had a peculiar descriptive name. Conor's armour is specifically named hereafter. Mr. M'Pherson, and his associates of the faction of imposition, name the standard of Finn Mac Cumbail, Sile Srejne, literally brilliancy or splendour of sun, which, however, they translate sun-beam. They even affect to bring the expression into their injudicious, unmetrical jargon thus:

Do éogamajm Sile Srejne le cpann.

This they translate, "we raised the sun-beam." In this line there are ten syllables, three syllables more than are admissible in any line of our old QUARTANS, which QUARTANS Mr. M'Pherson affects to translate; as they include

than any other person in the world ; for it was frequent with her to go abroad to seek Naisi, and to bring tidings unto him, and from him. Lavar-cam proceeded forward to the place where Naisi and Deirdri were, and she found them with the *polished cabinet** between them, and they playing upon it ; and she gifted them with kisses affectionately and eagerly, and said ; “ Not well do “ you do to have playing upon it at this time, the “ thing which Conoꝛ thinks worst of having been “ taken from him, except Deirdri alone ; and it “ is to know if her own form and shape live upon “ Deirdri,

include determined meanings within every line, generally ; but within every stanza, certainly. There is nothing in English so closely expressive of our regular ode, (in which most of the poems attributed to Oisín are written,) as Gray’s “Triumphs of Owen.” The above line respecting the standard, runs thus in a seven syllable quartan of correct genuine IRISH :

Thoꝝam ꝑal ꝑiꝑiꝑe le cꝑann.

We raised the SUN-BURST to the staff.

ꝑal, signifies a vapour ; also, when with ꝑiꝑan, the sun, that sort of sun-shine that bursts through the interstices of the clouds, illuminating partial spots in cloudy weather. This gives a fine idea of Finn’s bright standard.

no a tēnain fejn aji Dhēj:ore. to curreð mje am fo, acas aq truağ hōmfa an zñjñ do dēntar a noēt an Eñajñ, jdon fell acas jñgal do dēnain jñte, jdon trj comle zañzeð na n-ğacdal do ċur ċum bāj, acas nĵ bjağ Eñajñ nĵ ĵerri zo bñajñe an bñāta, acas to jñe an laejð
 zo truağ tujñeac:

Truağ nem' ċrojðe an mebañ,
 Dēntar a noēt an Eñajñ,
 O 'n mebañ meblaē amaē,
 buð hĵ an Eñajñ jñğalaē.

Truar<sup>2</sup>as uajñle a nju fo nññ,
 'S aq ĵerri dār ċāðajñ talimujñ, Dojñge hōmfa a noēt mur tā,
 ði tujñm a loēt aen nññā.

Nacje acas ðññle zo m-blağð,
 ðeacñ ðñðāñ a m-bñātañ,

fell

* This alludes to the fact in history of the destruction of Eman, in consequence of the death of the sons of Usnach.

“ Deirdri, that I have been sent here; and sorrowful to me is the deed that is to be done this night in Eman, that is, that treachery and assassination shall be perpetrated in it; that is, that the three luminaries of valour, of the Gaeils, will be put to death, and Eman will not be better to the brink of eternity.”* And she raised the sorrowfully-lamentable strain:

“ Sorrowful to my heart, the treachery
 That is perpetrated this night in Eman;
 From the treachery, deceitful forth,
 It will be the Eman contentious.”

“ Three the most noble, this day, under Heaven,
 And the most excellent of all for whom the
earth hath yielded;
 Grievous to me this night is
 Their fall for the indiscretion of any woman.”

“ Naisi and Ainle renowned,
 And Ardan their brother;

“ Treachery

Usnach. It is the poet's prophecy after the fact, neatly and judiciously introduced.

Կէլ ալի ալ ծրեյմ ո-ծրե՛-ցլոյն իսա՛ծ,
Նո՛ւնս իյոմքս նա՛ն լան տրսա՛ց.

Չի հ-ալէլե նա լաւո՛ւք ին, ա ծո՛ւբայր Լե-ծար՛ւսս իբ մազայ՛ն Ալիսի՛ց ազալ իբ շլոյն
Բերցուլ շոյնի ազալ Կսլոյնե՛ծնա՛ն շի՛ցե նա
Շրաւո՛ւք իսա՛ծե ծո ծրսլո՛ւք ծո մալէ, ազալ Շալմա՛ւէտ, ազալ Շրո՛ւծա՛ւէտ ծո ծ՛նան; ազալ,
ա շլան Բերցուլ, Շոյնա՛ց ծսր Շսմայրե
Շո Կերրո՛ւն Շո շի՛ց Բերցուլ: ազալ Բերրո՛ւ
Բսա՛ծ, ազալ Բենա՛ւէտայն ծա՛ն շլոյն; ազալ ծո Շաւի Կրա՛սն ծ՛յան ծ՛ն, ազալ Շայնե իբսր,
մսր ա իսլ Շոնո՛ւբար, ազալ ծ՛րիսրայց Շոնո՛ւբար Կ՛ւլա Շիւրոյն ծո, ալ ալի ին
ա ծո՛ւբայր Լեծար՛ւսս ա՛յն շլոյն մալէ, ազալ ծրո՛ւք շլոյն ազամ ծսր, Շրո՛ւք նա շլոյն
ին, ալ Շոնո՛ւբար? Չի լա՛ն, ալ ին, շի՛ց մե Ալիսի՛ց

*The English Versification, from the literal Translation,
by Mr. WILLIAM LEAHY.*

Treach'ry gives the deadly blow
To night, and fills my soul with woe!
For which dire act, it is decreed,
That Eman will in future bleed.

“ Treachery on this bright-visaged youthful “ group,
 “ It is not to me, that it is not, plenitude of “ sorrow.”

After this lay, Levarcam desired the sons of Usnach and the children of Fergus to close well the doors and windows of the house of the Red Branch, and to exert valour and resolution; “and children of Fergus,” said she, “defend your charge manfully until Fergus come, and thence derive success and blessing.” And she much-affected, shed quick-trickling showers of tears, and came on where Conor was; and Conor asked of her the tidings of Deirdri? And then Levarcam said, “I have good tidings and bad tidings for you.” What tidings is that? said Conor.

M

“ It

The noblest three beneath the sky,
 Nor braver earth sustain'd—must die!
 By one rash woman's heedless thought,
 Alas! to quick destruction brought.

Nais, Ainli—Ardan's might,
 Three youthful chiefs, renown'd in fight!
 Their blood, to-night, in Eman flows,
 And whelms me in a tide of woes!

Այսինքն զո շեռէտ շնորհաքս ան քնոյ, յծոն,
 ան տրխար աս քերթոս, ասայ աս քրծոս, ասայ աս քերթ քելն ասայ ճնան, յսյոլլ ասայ եւոօքս ՚ի ան յոման, ասայ քօք իյայծ Էրե աջալնի քերթս, Օ շայո մյս Այսինքն ինն; ասայ աս յաճ քելն աս մեքս աջամ, յծոն, ան ծեն զօ ի՛ քերթ քելն ասայ ճնան, քրսյէ ասայ եւոօքս զօ մնայն ան յոման աջ յմեւէտ Օ Էման յի, իսն ա քրսյէ ո՞ս ա քելն քերթ այրէտ.

Տար զօ շուա Կոնշնար ին, զօ շուայծ
 մօրան զա եւո այր քքն, ասայ զօ իյ աջ Օլ ասայ աջ ալնեք տրեյմքի քիսոս, ոս իսր քսուայն այր Ճիւրքօք ան յարս քեւտ. Ճա երք ին իօ իայէքերն յ՛քիսքայն Կոնշնար, քիս զօ իքսյոյն զօ իքնոս քելնոս Ճիւրքօք շնորհս? ասայ ոյ քքսայն քեն յսյե զօ իսւսոս ան; զօ իսոս Կոնշնար ի քրեյքօքն, ան քքեւայն

* The pia fraus, i.e. the honest art of Levarcam here practised on royal Conor, now old and versed in life, though having a temporary, ought not to be supposed capable of having a permanent effect, particularly on the most artful, learned, and experienced man of his time; now fired by disappointed lust, and therefore the most furious jealousy. The melancholy effects of such sentiments and principles are disastrous for ages.

“ It is,” said she, “ that the three sons of Usnach “ have come to you there ; namely, three the most “ manful and valiant, and possessed of the most “ excellent visage and shape, energy and form in “ the world ; and, moreover, you will henceforth “ sway Eirin, as the sons of Usnach are with you.*
 “ And they are the worst tidings I have, namely,
 “ that the woman of the most excellent visage
 “ and shape, at her departure from Eman, is “ bereft of her own colour and countenance.”

When Conor heard this, much of his jealousy abated, and he continued to indulge in feasting† and enjoyment along while, until he thought of Deirdri a second time. Shortly after this, Conor asked, “ whom would I find to bring the tidings of “ Deirdri to me?” And he found not an individual that would go thither.‡ Conor said unto

Trendorn

† Ol, literally, signifies DRINKING, but is often set down for the miscellaneous enjoyment of a feast.

‡ His wrath was expected to be exhausted by delay and dissipation, and the children of Usnach had all his court well affected towards them. But against a tyrant’s mandate, nothing will prevail in favour of honesty.

Կբժոյն շա զօ մարծ շ-աճայ, աճա՛ զօ շրայ քերծնաճար? Չի տա ա Կիկ ին աճամբա,
 աբ. Երեմօրն, իսր աբ է Նաեկի մաճ Ակուճ
 զօ մարծ յաճ. Պա Կ' էժ, աբ Կօնճար, իկուայ իժմաճ զ' Կիկ աբ մայրոնն ա ճիծ
 Կբն աբ Ծիճորք; ժր մա մայրոնն, նի Կբն աբ զրայմ զօմայն, նա աբ շայն ճալման
 ինն ա՛ Կլլե 'նա ի.

Չօ իկուայ Երեմօրն զօ ճիճ նա քրաճիճ իկուայճ, աճա՛ իկուայ զօրնի աճա՛ իկուայ նա իկուայն յար նա ն-ժմաճ, աճա՛ իժ իճ էճա աճա՛ Կանայն մօրն է, աճա՛ ա՛ էժ իժ իաճ: նի քօնայն ճօրն զ' աբն նիճ միճ Ակուճ զ' ինկայճ, ժր մեքայմ զօ Կբն Կբն ճօ ի-մարճաճ ժրն, աճա՛ ժա էիկ ին իկուայ իկուայն

* The historic tract subjoined, will tell a different story, but STORY and TALE are very different. The means of exciting enmity here, is like that of the moderns; treacherous private incitement of enmity. If the sons of Usnach, (in battle,) might have taken off the father and sons of Trendorn, that should not, or could not be a cause of enmity; except that any cause of injury will be remembered for ages. They may think it right to take vengeance for the loss of a parent in infancy, that subjected their growth to slavery.

Trendorn,* “knowest thou who slew thy father “and thy three brothers?” “The knowledge of
 “that I possess,” said Trendorn, “that it is “Naisi, the son of Usnach, who slew them.”
 “Therefore,” said Conor, “go thy way to know “if her own countenance live upon Deirdri? for “if her own visage live upon her, there is not on “the ridge of the world, or on the extent of the “earth, a woman that is more handsome than “she.”

Trendorn went to the house of the Red Branch, and found the doors and windows of the mansion shut, and great fear and terrour seized upon him;
 and thus he said: “It is not a proper path for any “individual to approach the sons of Usnach, for “I judge that wrath is abundantly upon them.”†
 And after that he found a window that was left open

† All the underlings of a tyrant know either wholly or in part his determination. This underling seems to speak from knowledge. He appears a nasty tool of mean determinate cruelty. A spy of the meanest kind, that would not encounter any thing but distant danger; while honour is incapable of being corrupted, and would refuse no danger.

ƿuinnēōs do ƿāgbad oflucete a n-dearinnad aſſ an m-bruiſſin, acas do bī aſ ū n-aniane aſteō, acas do fhēuē Dēirōne aſſ, tref an ƿƿuinnēōs, acas do minſ Dēirōne do Naeſe go ƿƿaca aen ōglaē aſ aniane omēaſb tref an ƿƿuinnēōs; acas h anlaſō do bī Naeſe an tan ſin, acas ƿen-ƿōſſne
 o' ƿhuſſin na ƿſēſſle ann a laſin, acas tuſ urēar āgmar, ſan ēaſne, ſan claeſne aſſ ſūl an ōglaē, ſun ēun an t-ſūl tan
 a ēloſenn amac. Do luſō an t-ōglaē mur a naſb Conēūbar, acas do minſ ſcēla ō ēūſ go deſſeō do.

2l ƿſin ſin, an Conēūbar, ba nſſ aſſ an domian ƿen an urēar ſin, muna ƿſl ſaeſal ſaſſō aſſ. Cſeō ſ an deſlō a tā aſſ Dhēirōne? aſſ Conēūbar. 2l tā, an Trenōſſin naē ƿſl 'ſ an domian ben aſ ƿen deſlō, acas dēnam 'nā ſ. 9lan do ēuala

* CONOR was a sovereign of much power and great genius, and was therefore jealous, doubly jealous of the heroic informed youths, the sons of Usnach.
 CONOR MAC NESSA was the best informed of ancient Irish princes, CORMAC MAC ART only excepted. But the latter lived centuries after the former.

open through forgetfulness on the mansion, and he was viewing them inwards ; and Deirdri looked at him through the window ; and Deirdri told unto Naisi, that she saw some fellow viewing them through the window ; and so was Naisi at that time, and a man of the set of the chess with him in his hand, and he made a fortunate throw, without curve or aberration thereof, at the eye of the fellow, so that he drove his eye out of his head. The fellow went whither Conor was, and detailed the tidings from beginning to end unto him.

“ True it is,” said Conor, “ the man of that throw would be king of the world,* if he have not short life.” What visage is upon Deirdri ? said Conor. “ It is,” says Trendorn, “ that there is not in the world a woman possessed of superior visage and form than she.” † As Conor heard

† The drift here is evidently that Conor suspected the affectionate sincerity of Levarcam, with justice indeed ; and then he employs a man of known meanness at his court. Tyranny never willingly employs any thing else than willing meanness. It may be objected that jealousy is madness.

éuala Conéúbar fji no ljon d' éo, acaq d'fhoruod, acaq d'fhógafr do na glógaib dol d'innfaid na buighe ann a naib clann Ufng. Tancatar rómpa go teé na Craeib-ruaidé, acaq do léigedap tñj gápta móp-aidéle aqta 'na tmeill, acaq do éurgedap teimne acaq ruadlafnaéa imne. Mar do éualað me Ufng na gápta fji, d'fhafraigedap eja ój fá 'n craeb ruaidé? Conéúbar acaq Ulað, ar cáé go coicéem. Uf coimul gur ab j cumaire fherguif do b' úil ljo
 do bñged, ar Jollann fji. bñatap ðamíca, ar Conéúbar, buð h-ajreé do éloim Uf-ng mo ben fa do beje aca. Uf fji fji, ar Déirdre, do fhell ferguif opaid. Dar mo éubar, ar buimne boib ruad, ma fhell nj fhellaimne. Uf an fji táme buimne boib

* This passage conveys a powerful idea of the reliance of old on plighted faith; but Conor acting under the influence of jealousy, had no regard to the common ties of the manners of the day. "Conor
and Ulster," will be easily understood to mean Conor at the head of the force of Ulster, of which he was sovereign. The honourable feeling, as well as the practice

heard this, he filled of jealousy and envy, and he proclaimed unto the troops to go to assault the mansion in which were the children of Usnach. They came forward to the house of the Red Branch, and they sent forth three great dreadful shouts around it; and they set fires and red flames unto it. As the sons of Usnach heard these shouts, they asked who were about the Red Branch? "Conor and Ulster;" say all around. "It is like that it is Fergus's guaranty you mean to break," said Illan the fair.* "By my troth," said Conor, "it will be subject of regret to the children of Usnach to have my wife." "True it is," said Deirdri, "Fergus has acted traitorously towards you." "By my troth," said Buini the ruthless red, "if he hath been treacherous, we will not be treacherous." And then Buini the ruthless red practice of the time, was so much in aversion, as it should ever be, to treachery, that the men here in danger shew heroism. Female quickness of apprehension and sensibility are highly exemplified in Deirdri; but its extravagance is pictured in accusing Fergus of treachery. Fergus's heroic honour could not abide the idea of treachery, and dearly did he make Ulster pay for the breach of his guaranty. It produced a war that ended not but with the destruction of its capital, Eman, and its power

N came

borb ruatō amac; acas do marb tɾj čacca curatō amujē, acas do čujɾ buajōreō mōɾ aɾi na ɟlōgajō. Do ɟɟmajɾajō Cončubar cɾa do ɾɾine an eɟorɟajɾi mōɾ ɟɾi aɾi na ɟlōgajō? ɟɟe buɾine borb ruatō mac ɟerɟuɟa, aɾi ɟē. Cūma uajɾɟj tujɟ, aɾi Cončubar; cā cūma ɟɾi? aɾi buɾine borb ruatō.
 Tɾjca-čēō d'ɟheraɾi, aɾi Cončubar, cɾēō aɟle aɾi buɾine borb ruatō? ɟɟo čozar acas mo čōmaɾle, aɾi Cončubar. ɟebatoɟa ɟɾi, aɾi buɾine borb ruatō. Do ɾɾineō ɟɟab mōɾ don tɾjca-čēō ɟɾi na cūma an aɟōce ɟɾi ɟēɾi, acas de do ɟorčajō Sɟab dāl-bɟuɾine, d'ā ɾ-ɟorɟar ɟɟab ruatō an tan
 ɟo. Oo' čuala Dēɾoɾe an cōmaō ɟɾi, aɟ bɾajar daniɟa, aɾi ɟɟ, do čɾēɟɟ buɾine borb ruatō ɟjō, acas don tōɟē aɟ ačɾa-mɟɟ an mac ē. Dar ɟo deɾɾi, aɾi Illaɾi ɟɾi ɾj h-ēō ɟɾi dan ɟēɾi, an ɟēō maɾi-ɟēɟ

* In this and the like descriptions; it must be recollected that leading youths, of this age, had a powerful retinue of military adherents attached to them as to their lives.

† It is remarkable that the inducement of riches without the adjunct of power was not deemed sufficient

came forth, and slew thrice fifty men* of might abroad, and he put great confusion on the troops. Conor asked who made that great havock of the troops? "I am he, Buini the ruthless red, son of Fergus," said he. "A bribe, from me to you," said Conor. "What is that bribe?" said Buini the ruthless red. "A district of land," said Conor. "What else?" said Buini the ruthless red. "My privacy and counsel,"† said Conor. "I will accept that," said Buini the ruthless red. That district of the bribe was made a great moor that very night; and it used to be called the moor of the race of Buini, which is called the mountain of Foad at this day. When Deirdri heard this conversation, "by my troth," said she, "Buini the ruthless red hath forsaken you; and, as I think, he is a father-like son." "By all that is certain," says Illan the fair, "that is not my own case; while sufficient inducement to make Buno a traitor to his trust. The hate of treachery is marked with a miracle by the poet. In some copies I find Slyab dá bhujne, the moor of double Buno, for Slyab dá bhujne, the moor of the race of Buno, as in the text.

ƳeƳ an clojðem cael, ðhneé so ann mo
lám, nġ ċpġeġƳad clann Uġnġ.

Ƴlġ a h-aġtle ġm tãnjc Jollan ġm amacé, acaƳ tuc tġġ luacéuapda ġ tġmġell na
brujġne, ġm marð tġġ ċċð lacé amujé, acaƳ tãnjc aƳċé mup a nað Nafġe, acaƳ
ġ aġ ġmġc na Ƴċéġle, acaƳ Ƴhntc mup aen
ġmġ. Tġġ Jollann amacé an ðana Ƴċġt, acaƳ tuc tġġ luacé-ċuapda eġle um an mbrujġm, acaƳ ġuc lóċpam aġ laƳad leġ aġ an ƳƳaċċé, acaƳ ðo ġab aġ ġlojðċð na ġlóg, acaƳ nġm' lãmġat na ġlóg tċġt
ð' ġmġaġðe na brujġne; acaƳ ġo buð maġċ an mac ġm Jollann ġm, ðm nġm' ġm neé aġm ðmġm ðomġm ġġam Ƴá nġ tã
m-beġċ

* Meaning, while I live and am able to hold it;
and well and faithfully did he perform his promise.

† This seeming apathy appears, at first view, extravagant fiction; but we must look a little into the minds of the ancients before we condemn this relation. Chess is a military game, and engages the mental faculties like mathematical science. What amusement, then, fitter for the contemplation of a hero in the midst of danger,

“ while liveth* this small, straight sword in my hand,
 “ I will not forsake the children of Ustach.”

After this came Iollan the fair forth, and he made three quick circuits round the mansion, so that he slew three hundred men or might abroad; and he came in where was Naisi playing at the chess,† and Ainli together with him. Iollan goes out the second time, and made three quick circuits round the mansion, and took a lighted torch with him on the lawn, and he began cutting down the troops, and the troops dared not come to attack the mansion. A generous youth was this Illan the fair; for he refused not a person on the ridge of the world for any thing he might possess,
 and

danger, confident of the capacity and exertion of his friend? He was besides in a fortress, with sufficient force, as he thought, to defend it until day, when the affections of all the great of Ulster, he was sure, would come to his aid. But the deed of the attack was that of darkness, and the deeds of darkness generally best succeed, unfortunately for the world, while those of day and light are often defeated. This is the contemplation of the ancient poet; and he makes his hero appear contemplatively careless, relying on courage, virtue, and affection.

m-lejē aje, acas nji<sup>o</sup> žad tuapaftal o acn duje njan aēt o fherzuf.

Blz am jn a dūbajre Conēūban, cū
 b-ajē a ffl mo mac fējn, fjaēpa fjnn?
 acajm fume, a žro fblajē, an fjaēpa.
 Dar mo bpačar, an fē, aq an aen ajōēj
 nugaō tū fēja acas Jollam, acas oq žad ajm ačar a tā aječan, bejnfj m<sup>o</sup> ajmfj leat, jdon, an Alejn, acas an eoſſraē, acas an foq, acas an colz glaſ, jdon, mo fcač acas mo dā flejz, acas mo eloſōem mōr, acas tēnajo calmaēt acas epōtaēt mōr leo.

Do ēōjyō fjaēpa a čorp jf na b-ajmajō fēunta, fomaječa jn Conēūban, acas do jnūčajz Jollan fjnn, acas do jnūmedar cōni-nac fejz, fuhtōē, fcmjata, nerpimur, najndamaj, čenn, tpejōpōb, tjmefnač je čēſle:
 aēt

In ancient times to receive wages made any person pass as a hireling, and the praise here bestowed is that Illan would yield to no man but his father; a high character. "The judge of the world" is an expression peculiar in our language.

† These are the significant names of Conor's arms:
 "The Blue-green Blade," Mr. M'Pherson retains. Its being an appropriately descriptive name of a sword was sufficient

and he received not wages* from any one man ever but from Fergus.

And then it was that Conor said, "where is
 "my own son Fiacara the fair?" "I am here,
 "my sovereign," says Fiacara. "By my troth," says he, "it was on the same night that thou thy"self and Iollan the fair were born; and as they "are his father's arms he hath, take thou my arms
 "with you, namely, the Ocean, the Victorious, and
 "the Cast, and the Blue-green Blade; that is,
 "my shield and my two javelins, and my broad
 "sword,† and exert great resolution and valour
 "with them."

Fiacra arrayed his frame in those prosperous gorgeous arms of Conor, and he attacked Iollan the fair; and they made warlike, bloody, desperate, forceful, inimical, stout, mighty-violent, wreckless fight with each other.‡ But so it is that Illan the fair

sufficient to attract the notice of his taste; the other names, as he thought, would encumber his diction.
Ocean is a very appropriate name for a shield in the peculiar language in which alone the word OCEAN is derivable.

‡ The reader is left to judge of this description of fighting. The father of poetry has introduced single combat in the presence of contending hosts.

aét a tá an nǵ céona, do éinn Iollaín fínn
 aǵn fhuaca, mnaǵ go tuacc aǵn luǵeò aǵn fǵáǵé a fceǵé, acaǵ suǵ ééǵ an 2leéǵn ne méro an éǵǵn mǵ a naǵb. Oǵn buò ééǵ do fceǵé Chonéúbaǵn gǵmeò le fceǵéǵn an tǵ aǵn a m-beǵo; acaǵ no ééǵǵtaǵn tǵ. pǵǵmzonna na l-éǵenn, ǵdon, Tomǵ Tuǵǵé, Tomǵ Cǵo-úá, acaǵ Tomǵ Rúònaǵóe aǵ fǵeǵnaò
 óǵ. 2ǵ éinn ǵn do bǵ Conall Cernaé a n-Dun Solvaǵce, acaǵ do éuala Tomǵ Tuǵǵé. 2ǵ fǵǵn ǵn, aǵ Conall, a tá Chéúbaǵn an éǵǵǵn, acaǵ nǵ cóǵn Daǵnfa éǵtéaét fǵǵǵ.

Do

* These introductions of the marvelous and of prodigy are only the liberties of poetic fiction, common to the poetry of all languages. The names of the waves here introduced, is, on purpose, to introduce grand natural objects to the mind. The roaring of waves dashing against and into the hollow caves of promontories, are objects of grand terror to those immediately within view and hearing; and even those within distant audience of the noise are solemnly affected.

† The poet here covers with a fiction what he would fain his audience or reader conceive; that Conor, in his danger, sent for Conall Carnach, and that upon his arrival he pointed out the danger of his son, without

fair overcame Fiacra, so that he forced him to crouch beneath the shade of his shield, and that the Ocean, that is Conor's shield, fatally roared on account of the danger in which he was; for it was fatal for the shield of Conor to roar at the danger of the person on whom it would be;† and the three principal waves of Eirin, namely, the wave of TOTH, the wave of CLIDNA, and the wave of RORY, roared responsive to it. Then was Conall Carnach at Dunsobarki, and he heard the wave of Toth. "True it is," said Conall, "Conor is in danger, and it is not meet for me "to listen to it."‡ out letting him into the secret, that he had devoted the children of Usnach to his vengeance. He doubted not his loyalty, but he dreaded his affection for the children of Usnach, his beloved, valiant cousin Germans, and in some measure, as appears, his wards. The violence that follows shews this well, and the rage and conflict of passions, here briefly detailed, though well understood at a glance by the ancients, are not to be understood now but with attentive contemplation. That Conall Carnach should leave the scene of action, cannot be understood, but from a consideration of his loyalty. His violence to the son of his sovereign was the effect of instantaneous passion. But here we are only investigating

O

Conall

Do ēnīg Conall aq a h-ašēle, acaq do žab a aym acaq a ēpdeō uyme, acaq tānje nojme mup a rajb Conēubar a n-ēmajn-Mača, acaq ruajm an cōmpac aym an ffašēē, acaq fjačpa mac Conēubar dā ēlaejō žo mōp aq Jollann fym, acaq nšp' lāmfač Rjg Ulaō, no aen dujne d' Ullajb an edaržan, aēt tānje Conall do leje a ēujl aym Jollann fym acaq fāšēf an colg žlaq tpe n-a ēnojde. Čja do žujm me do leje mo ēujl, aym Jollann fym, acaq že b' ē do njne, dar mo lājm žoje do žebaō fē cōmpac do leje m'ajgē uajmfe.
 Čja tuša fējm, aym Conall? mšj Jollann
 fym mac fheržufa, acaq an tuša Conall?
 Žq me, aym Conall. Žq mōp an žujm do njnjš, aym Jollann, acaq mje Ušnīg aym mo ēumajpē. Žm fšj fym, aym Conall?
 Žq fšj žo dejmj, aym Jollann. Dar mo lājm žoje, aym Conall, nš bēupajō Conēubar a mac fējm 'n a žēča uajmfe a n-djžal

ignating the mental wandering of poetic fiction. The historic fact itself is not told without the habiliment of poetry. The ancients never told a story without an endeavour to give it glow enough to warm the reader's mind and imagination.

Conall arose after this, and he took his arms and armour on him, and he came on to where Conor was in Eman of Macha, and he found the fight on the lawn, and Fiachra, the son of Conor, greatly exhausted by Illan the fair; and the king of Ulad, or any of the Ultonians dared not interfere between them; but Conall came behind Illan the fair, and he thrust the blue-green blade through the region of his heart. “Who hath pierced me at my back?” says Illan the fair, “and who ever did it, by my hand of valour he would have got battle opposite my face from me, although he hath pierced me at my back.” “Who art thou thyself?” says Conall. “I am Illan Fin,* son of Fergus; and art thou Conall?” “It is I,” says Conall. “Great (dreadful), is the deed thou hast done,” says Illan, “and the sons of Usnach under my protection.” “Is that true?” says Conall. “It is true indeed,” says Illan. “By my hand of valour,” says Conall, “Conor shall not bear his son alive from me in “vengeance

* How ridiculous it would be to translate this ILLAN FINGAL, instead of Illan the fair; yet an adherent of the Macphersonian system would have the hardihood so to render it.

n-djgal an gñjma fñ, acaq nq fñ tue bëjm clojòm d' fhaéra, sur bajn a éem
 te. fúzluq Conall mur fñ jad. Tãme tajimëla báq an Jollann fjonni ann fñ, acaq to tészg a ajm q in m-brujgn, acaq
 a dúbanre ne Naeqe calmaét to dënam, acaq égaq aq a h-ajële.

Uq ann fñ táncatar Ullad j tejimëll na brujgne, acaq to cupredan tejnite acaq tenidála junte. Tãme Urdan amaé ann fñ, acaq no niúé na tejnite, acaq to marb trj ééd amujé, acaq éuajò Ujnnle amaé an trjan ajle ton ajdée, acaq to marb qé ééd amujé, acaq tue floydéd acaq úr cupatò orpa.

Tãme Naeqe amaé an trjan dëgnac ton ajdée acaq to éur na flöz ule ó 'n
 m-brujgn, acaq to marb dá ééd amujé.
 Uq ann fñ to gñéqajò Coréúban Ullajò acaq tuatar cajé na majone d'á éële, acaq to qraenad an cajé an Ullacajb,
 acaq nó fo n-ajimëtar gajm mara no tuile qeda, no dpuét for qhër, no nëulta njie, nq bëjrm njm no úreni a rajb to éennajb cupat, acaq mjljò, acaq to mejsli maelderga

“vengeance for that deed :” and with that he gave a blow of a sword to Fiacra, so that he took his head off him. Thus Conall left them. The weak shades of death then came upon Illan the fair, and he threw his arms into the mansion, and said unto Naisi, to exert resolution, and expired at once.

And now the Ultonians came around the mansion, and set fires and faggots to it. Then came forth Ardan and put out the fires, and slew three hundred abroad ; and Ainli went forth the other third of the night, and slew six hundred abroad, and cut down and slew their men of might.

Naisi came forth the last third of the night, and he drove all the troops from the mansion, and he slew two hundred abroad. And then Conor set on the Ultonians, and they gave the battle of the morning to each other, and the battle was carried from the Ultonians ; and until are counted sand of sea, or foliage of woods, or dew on grass, or stars of Heaven, it is impossible to reckon or enumerate what were of heads of heroes and men of might, and of trunks, red-bare from the hands
of

maēl tēpza ō lāmajō Naeke aji an lačar
 ſm. Čānje xā 'n mbrujšm jar ſm. Žf an ſm do eņže Dējrore, acaſ a tūbaņte ſmu, dar mo lājm, aſ buadaē an tuņaf ſm do ſmneō lž, acaſ dēnaō calmaēt acaſ beōdaēt buō dēſta, acaſ aſ ole an ēōmaņle do ſmnebaņ, taebaō le Concubar zo brāt, acaſ x truaž nācar žababaņ mo ēomaņle xējm rojme-ſm.

Imčufa mac n-Ukņž do ſmnevar daņžen maž dā ſejačajō, acaſ do ēuņevar corpa
 a ſejača j tčjmēōl Žhējrore etuņpa, acaſ tucatar trj lējm eo h-ačlain, ēnaiaj tar niūmajō ō Emajm amac, acaſ do maņbavar
 trj cēō xer ton mačar ſm.

Har do ēomaņle Concubar ſm do ēuažō
 eo Cačbaō vpa, acaſ a tubaņte xņf, mējž a Cačbaō zo mje Ukņž, acaſ mņr vpaējōēēt oņpa; ōjm muna ccoxčēer jaō mjlxfō

* The poetic hyperbole is left to the reader to determine on it as his own taste and judgment may direct :
 our business is to give a fair translation of our original.

of Naisi, then on the place of action.* He came into the mansion after this. And now Deirdri arose and said unto them: “By my troth, prosperous “is this movement just made by you; and exert “fortitude and vigor henceforward, and bad is the “resolve you have made, to trust in Conor to “eternity; and sad that you did not take my coun“sel heretofore.”†

As to what regards the sons of Usnach, they made a firm phalanx of their shields, and put the links of their shields around Deirdri between them, and they gave three bounds actively, as birds, over the walls of Eman outwards, and slew three hundred as they went along on this rushing.

As Conor saw this, he went to Cathbad the Druid, and said unto him: “Go Cathbad,” says he, “unto the sons of Usnach and play enchant- “ment‡ upon them; for if they be not restrained
 “they

† The influence of beauty on gallantry and valour is constantly exhibited throughout this tale.

‡ Literally druidism. This was the poetic machinery of our ancient poets; for the reader is not to forget that it is a tale poetically embellished, though founded mllxto Ullcaig zo bpač, mað jmjgto uada d'án-amdeon; acas do bejym-ſj mo bpačar xjor-laeje naé egaſ dájð mjfe, aét zo pabaſto dom rēſj. Do aentcaig Cačbað ſj dō, aſj na épejtemaſj, acas do éuaſto a ceeni a eólaſ, acas a elatna, do éofz clojme Uſjnjg, zur mjſj dpujðeét orpa;

 jdon, muſj tēétajgēte do éur 'n a tcméell,
 maſle ſe tonnaſð duaſmjfeča, jmuſ zur ab
 anlaſto do bſ mj Uſjnjg ag ſmām aſj xáſto na talman ag mjteét ó Emaſj dájð; gjeð njr lámſat Ulað jað to mjſaſto no zur tujtſat a n-aſjm aſ a lámajð; acas jaſ tujtſj na n-aſjm uáča, do zaðað mj
 Uſjnjg, acas a h-aſtle a n-zaðála, do jaſſ
 Conéubar aſj élanmajð Duſjeéet a maſbað.
 Al dúbajſt elanna Duſjeéet naé dēnoſj ſj.
 Zo

founded on fact. Cuthbad or Caffu was a Druid, and the maternal grandfather of the sons of Usnach. No wonder he should not be willing to practise his art on them without assurance of their safety; but the enraged Conor was not to be restrained from vengeance for the loss of his intended bride, by any plighted promises.

* Perhaps this means intrinsically no more than Caffu's power of persuasion and parental influence over the sons of Usnach to make them submit.

“ they will destroy the Ultonians for ever, should “ they escape in spite of them; and I pledge
 “ my solemn asseveration of a true hero that I “ will be no danger to them, provided they be “ of my accord.” Cathbad believing him, consented to this; and he had recourse to his intelligence and art to restrain the children of Usnach, so that he laid them under enchantment; that is, by putting around them a viscid sea of whelming waves;* so that the sons of Usnach were as if swimming along the ground as they were departing from Eman; however, the Ultonians dared not approach them until their arms fell from their hands; and after their arms fell from them, the sons of Usnach were taken, and Conor commanded their being put to death; and the Ultonians consented not to do this, for there was not a person among the Ultonians without having wages from Naisi.† And then Conor said to the sons of Durecht, to put them to death; and the sons of Duthrecht said they would not do so. Conor had a fellow

P

† All the Ulster troops must then be his acknowledged vassals. The sons of Duthrecht are here said to have refused to execute the sons of Usnach, notwithstanding that in the historic account, Owen, the son of Duthrecht, is stated to be their assassin.

Do b'j ógláé az Conicobair dáir buð coniamní Máine lámgarb, mac Ríjé fionn loélan, acas a fē Naerfe do marb a ačair acas a d'jaq derbracair; Učac acas Tmāča á n-anmanna, acas a dúbairc go muirfead fē fēin me Uirijé. Má 'f ēd, ar Uiróan, marbčair mje air túq ó h me h óige dona brájerib, éum naé fcaicim mo brá-jere, dá marbad. Na marbčair, acé mje ar Uirle. Ná dēncar anilajd fín, ar Naerfe, óir a tá clojdem azam-ya éuc Manamán mac Uir dáin, acas n'j fhaž-bann fujgel buille no bēme, acas buastec fín ar tcrjur de, acas muirfjčair fín a cečdóir.

Uč f'jín fín, ar čac, acas f'jncar l'j
 búr ceim, acas búr m-brájčde, ar f'jad.
 Do f'jncar anm'jín a m-brájčde faera,
 fečajne, f'jčanila, acas tuc Máine luajčēim,
 čalma clojčim air an cečar, an aen'fheč d'ójb, acas do bajnead na t'j'j c'jín d'jób d'aen-bēim, acas do léjčdar f'jín Ulač t'j'j t'jóm.

* This affecting scene could not pass through the hands of an Irish poet without a mixture of the marvellous.

a fellow whose name was Maini Rough Hand, son of the king of Norway, and it was Naisi that slew his father and his two brothers, Athach and Triatha were their names; and he said that he himself would kill the sons of Usnach. "If so," says Ardan, "let me be killed first, since I am the youngest of the brothers, in order that I may not see my brothers killing." "Let him not be killed, but me," says Ainli. "Let it not be done so," says Naisi, "for I have a sword which Mananan the son of Lear* gave me, and it leaves not remains of stroke or blow, and let us three be struck together with it, and we will be killed at once."

"True it is," says every one, "and stretched by you be your heads and necks," say they. They then stretched their noble, stately, polished necks on the block at once, and then Maini dealt them a quick, forceful blow of the sword, and took the three heads off them at a stroke. And the men of Ulad then sent forth three heavy vellous. A sword of supernatural power only could do the murderous deed.

τρoμ-ḡáητá cúmaíò acaḡ caeηητε óḡ áηo umra aηη ḡηη.

Iméuḡa Dēηoηe ηó éaeíò ζo τηuaḡ, tuηηεé acaḡ ηo éaηηaηηḡ a ḡoíc acaḡ a ḡηηηαò, acaḡ το bḡ aḡ τεέτ a η éloηηη Uηηḡ,
acaḡ aηη 2lbaηη, acaḡ το ηḡηηε aη laíò:

Sóηaíò ḡoηη ζo h-2lbaη uaηη, ḡaḡe ηaòaηe a cuaη ḡa ḡleηη;
ḡaηη mbḡoò ηηe Uηηḡ aḡ ḡeí's, 2leḡbḡηη ḡaḡe óḡ leḡηḡ a beηη.

Lá dá ηaíò maḡe 2lbaη aḡ ól,
'S ηηe Uηηḡ dáη éóηη eηη, Dḡηḡḡηη ηaηlá dúna tpeoηη,
Do túc N'aeηe ηóḡ ḡaη ḡbḡḡ.

Do éuηη éuḡe eḡηo baéé, 2ḡe allaíò, η laeḡ ηe a coηη,
η do ḡab ḡé éuḡe aηη cuaηηe 2ḡe ḡillaò ó ḡluag Inbeη ηoηη.

ḡaη

* Deirdri is never tired of praising Alba from the security she, and the sons of Usnach, are stated to have enjoyed there in their flight from Eirin.

heavy shouts of sorrow and lamentation for them.

As to Deirdri, she cried sorrowfully and lamentably, and she tore her loose hair and dishevelled tresses ; and she was repeating tales of the children of Usnach and of Alba,* and she raised the strain :

“ Farewel east to Alba from me ;
 “ Delightful the sight of her harbours and vales ;
 “ Where the sons of Usnach pursued the chase ;
 “ Delightful to sit o’er the prospects of her “ cliffs.”

“ On a day that the nobles of Alba were “ feasting,
 “ And the sons of Usnach, deserving of love ;
 “ To the daughter of the lord of Duntrone,
 “ Naisi gave a kiss unknown.”

“ He sent her a frisking doe,
 “ A hind of the forest, and a fawn at its foot ;
 “ And he passed to her on a visit,
 “ On his return from the host of Inverness.”

“ Upon

9)ar do éualatò mje řm,
 Ljnas mo éjnn lán don éo,
 Chujnos mo éuréán ar tujm,
 'S ba cuma ljom bář no éř.

Lenadar mje ar a řfnáni,
 Zjnnle ř Zljtán nar éan bréř;
 Do řhjlodar me a řteaé,
 Dřř do éujřatò cač ar ééo.

Do éuc Naéře bjačar řo řřřř,
 ř do lujř řo éřř ř řřřřřř arř, Naé ccujřatò orř-řa řřuajř,
 řo řteřř uajř ar řřuař na marò.

Ué! dā cclujnatò řřř a noét,
 Naéře beřé řaj brat a cčřé,
 Do řujřatò řř řo beaét,
 'S do řujřřřř-řa řo řeét lé.

Ca b-jřgnani éřř ařam řéřř, Zljn éřřé Zlban řo řéřò řóo,

řa

† "By my hand of valour," or "by my arms of valour," is the usual oath of our ancient heroes.

" Upon my hearing of this,
 " My head fills full of jealousy;
 " I put my little skiff on the wave,
 " And indifferent to me was life or death."

" They pursued me on the float,
 " Ainli and Ardan, who uttered not falsehood;
 " They turned me inwards,
 " Two that would subdue in battle an hundred."

" Naisi gave his word in truth,
 " And thrice he swore, in presence of his " arms,*
 " That he would not put on me dissatisfaction,
 " Until he would go from me on the host of the " dead."

" Alas! heard she this night,
 " Naisi to be under cover in the earth,
 " She would with ready feeling weep;
 " And I would weep sevenfold with her."

" What wonder that I have fondness
 " For the regions of Alba of Smooth way;

" Safe

ba glán mo céisle na me-fé,
fá ljom féin a h-éic fa h-ór.

2l h-aféle na laeide sin, mur fuair Dēirdne aine éaic ari a céisle, tā, nje noimpe ari an faicé, acas í ari foluaimneò fíof acas
fúaf, ó duine, go duine acas tāpla Cúculojm D), acas nō naje a cumajne faim, acas do mif scēla do ó cúf go deirnead, amasl nō

* *The English Versification, from the literal Translation,
by Mr. WILLIAM LEAHY.*

Adieu to Alba's eastern shore,
And all its beauteous harbours wide,
And vales, where Usnach's sons pursued
The bounding deer with em'lous pride!

With what delight the eye survey'd,
From the grey cliff, that tow'rs on high,
The flow'ry plains, and meads below!—
The pleasing thought constrains a sigh!

One day, when Usnach's noble sons,
And Alba's lords enjoyed the feast;
The lips of Duntrone's daughter fair,
To his, in secret, Naisi press'd.

“ Safe was my husband among them ;

“ Mine own were her steeds and her gold.”*

After this lay, as Deirdri found the attention of each to other, she moved on the lawn, running distracted up and down from man to man, and Cuchullan happened to her, and she enjoined protection on him ; and she told him tidings, from

Q

beginning

He sent the dame a stately hind,
That, skipping, pac'd the verdant lawn,
And rang'd the woods, and leafy groves,
Close follow'd by a playful fawn.

But when th' account alarm'd mine ear,
That the brave youth, attentive, paid,
(Leaving the host of Inverness,)
A formal visit to the maid :

Fell jealousy inspir'd my soul,
I launch'd my skiff upon the wave,—
Despising life, I purpos'd then
To make the foamy tide my grave.

Anly and Ardan,—candid souls !
As on the distant shore they stood,
And saw my bark upon the deep,— Plung'd, instant, in the raging flood :

They

ո՞ր էրջժժժ Ե՞ր ճժոյն Արջնճ. Ե՞ր քրաճ յէ
 Ըննոյն ճն, ծր ո՞ր յաճ 'քան Ե՞ր յոյն Երյն Ե՞ր անքա յէր յա՞ Նաէր. Երա՞ր Ե՞ր քրա՞ր յա՞ր Ըննոյն Եր յա՞ր յա՞ր? Յայն յա՞ր, ար Երյն.

Եր արա՞ր ճն Ե՞ր յոյն Երյն ար ան յա՞ր, արա՞ր ո՞ր յա՞ր Ե՞ր յոյն արա՞ր արա՞ր արա՞ր, արա՞ր Ե՞ր յոյն արա՞ր արա՞ր, արա՞ր
 արա՞ր Երյն ար արա՞ր:

ԲԱԵ

They quick pursued, and turn'd the float,— Plough'd back again the liquid field;—
 Two dreadful chiefs,—whose might combin'd,
 Would make an hundred heroes yield!

Then Naisi pledg'd his sacred word,
 And thrice upon his falchion swore,—
 That while his bosom glow'd with life,
 He'd never cause me sorrow more.

Ah! was the bloody deed proclaim'd,—
 And did she hear the mournful tale!—
 That, in the dark cold womb of earth,
 Now Naisi lies deform'd and pale!—

To

beginning to end, how befel the children of Úsnach. Sad was this to Cuchullan,* for there was not in the world a person dearer to him than Naisi. And Cuchullan asked “who slew them?” “Maini “Rough Hand,” says Deirdri.

After this, Deirdri lay upon the grave, and she began to drink their blood abundantly,† and a mound was reared for them, and Deirdri raised the strain :

DEIRDRI'S

To death ingloriously betray'd!—
 This treach'rous act,—Oh!—did she know,—
 In anguish would she sadly weep!
 And I would drown her with my woe!

No wonder, that I love the land,—
 That, for its charming dales I pine!
 For there my much-lov'd lord was safe,
 And Alba's flowing wealth was mine!

* Cuchullan was the cousin german of the sons of Úsnach. His asking who put them to death, is a hint of purposed vengeance, but it is not told afterwards that it was executed.

† This is introduced as a mark of extreme affection, sorrow, and distraction; and however disgusting it may appear, still fidelity to the original obliges us to retain it.

Nuasl-tubad Dhéiríne an tSag éalaine Uíghé.

Fada an lá gan clann Uíghé,
Ní n' tuiscead beir na cealaíct,
Ghe n'óg ne n-olcais deórait;
Tí leómuin éime na huanna.

Tí lemnáin do nínáib bretan,
Tí febuic íléibe Cuillinn,
Ghe n'óg dár gíall an tSagí,
'S dá tuisceadís amuig uiríim.

Ná tí beiríneáca beóda,
Tí leómuin leasa comraé,
Ghe n'óg ne 'n maic a molaó,
Tí me uéca na n-ollcaé.

Tí gan laeé nár maic fá uiríim,
Dí tuisceim n' cuig tuisce,
Tí me n'ógíne Chacáit,
Tí gábla cača Cuailgne.

Tí

* A district in Ulster put here for the whole province.

DEIRDRI'S LAMENTATION FOR THE CHILDREN OF USNACH.

“ Long is the day without the children of “ Usnach ;

“ It was not irksome to be in their assemblage ;
“ Sons of a king, by whom sojourners were “ entertained ;
“ Three lions of the hill of Huama.

“ Three attachments of the fair of Britain ;
“ Three falcons of the mount of Culan ;
“ Sons of a king, to whom valour made obedience ;
“ And to whom heroes yielded homage.

“ Three mettlesome bears,
“ Three lions of the fort of Conrach ;
“ Sons of a king, to whom praise was wealth ;
“ The three sons of the breast of the Ultonians.

“ Three men of might, not liberal of homage,
“ Their fall is cause of sorrow.
“ The three sons of the daughter of Cathbad ;
“ The three props of the hosts of Cualgni.*

“ Three

Τῆς οὐρανῆς δῶνα ἡθῶναιδ',
 Ἄνα τῆς κυρίας ὄντι ἐρησβρῦαιδ',
 Ἄντι-οἰαῖς ἢ βα βεῶ μηε,
 Τῆς οὐρανῆς να ἐσαῖ ἐρησβρῦαιδ'.

Τῆς οὐρανῆς δῶνα ἡθῶναιδ',
 Δῶ μῆσθῶ ἐρησβρῦαιδ',
 Τῆς οὐρανῆς δῶνα ἡθῶναιδ',
 Τῆς οὐρανῆς δῶνα ἡθῶναιδ'.

Τῆς οὐρανῆς δῶνα ἡθῶναιδ',
 Τῆς οὐρανῆς δῶνα ἡθῶναιδ',
 Τῆς οὐρανῆς δῶνα ἡθῶναιδ',
 Ἄντι-οἰαῖς ἢ βα βεῶ μηε.

Οὐρανῆς δῶνα ἡθῶναιδ',
 Δῶ μῆσθῶ ἐρησβρῦαιδ',

Σεπτι

* Now Ballymoney, a post town in the north of Ireland

† Aifi is said to have had a military school in the isle of Sky, in conjunction with her father Otha. Cuchullan is said to have been bred there, and to have had Conloch by this military lady. The sons of Usnach and

Յերր մօ Գաճալ 'ն ա ոժայճ, Բերբաժ ա շշուճէ շաքարե.

Ծօ մայրցիւն ա՛ ոժայճ Նախքե,
 Նա Գաճալն ուճ այն շաքարե,
 Ա ոժայճ Այնիկ ապա Արժան, Երանալ-Գա նի Բայժօ անմայն.

'Ն ա ոժայճ նի Բա Եթ միքե, Երան Լիցեաժ տրե՛ Լար Եթե՛ա, Օ շալժօ մօ Լեւան ապիքե,
 Ծերբաժ այն ա ալճ շէ՛ա.

Ա Գիւն շուճալ ան մաժօրեւիտ,
 Նա՛ Են ան ալճ ծօ Երբաճ,
 Բաժ-Գա Ե Գրօճայն նա Խ-ալճե,
 Ան յճանալ տրալճե Կ օճան.

ԳՅՅՅ ԵՅ Գիւն ԵՅ Երբաճ,
 Ա Գրօճայն նա տրի՛ շաքարօ
 Ե՛ Գիւնցիւն ճան տե՛ ճան տեյնե, Նի՛ միքե նա՛ Բայժօ ծօ Երբաճ,

Ա տրի՛ Գաճա՛ Գ՛ ա Գլեճա,
 Գա Լեւա Եան ծօ միքե,

“ Short my life after them,
 “ I’ll plaintive sing their lamentable dirge.”

“ That I would live after Naisi, “ Let none on earth imagine ;
 “ After Ainli and Ardan,
 “ In me there will not be soul.”

“ After them alive I must not be ;
 “ Three that would rush through the midst of “ battle ;
 “ Since my attached has gone from me,
 “ I’ll shed showers o’er his grave.”

“ O! man, who diggest the new grave,
 “ Make not the tomb narrowly ;
 “ I’ll be over the grave,
 “ Reiterating sorrow and lamentation.”

“ Much difficulty would I encounter
 “ Along with the three heroes ;
 “ I would endure without house or fire ;
 “ It is not I that will not be melancholy.”

“ Their three shields and their three spears
 “ Have often been my bed ;

Cuir a ttrí cceolómé cruaidé,
 Óf éinn na huaidé a ghlé.

Altrí coim 's a ttrí febaic.
 Uaidé fefta hau luét feigá,
 Ttríur congála gaé caá,
 Ttríur dalcáin Chonall Cherrnáig.

Ttrí h-jalla na ttrí cceon fín,
 Do báin ofna af mo éroide, Uf agam do bí a ttríur,
 Uf ffaicéin h' ffaé caeide.

Ní pábas aen lá am aenar,
 Do lá dēnta na h-uaidé,
 Do mhuic do bí mhuic,
 Ucaí ffaicé do h-uaidéac.

Do éuaidé mo pádaré uaimí,
 Uf ffaicéin uaidé Naeicé,
 Do ffaicé me m'anam,
 Ní mairann mo luét caeinte.

0 's

Conall Carnach was lord of a district in Ulster, the cousin german, as we have seen, of the children
 of “ Set their three swords of steel

“ Over the grave, 'good wight.”

“ Their three hounds and their three falcons

“ Shall henceforward be without folk of game ;

“ Three sustainers of every conflict,

“ The three wards of Conall Carnach.”*

“ The three slips of these three hounds

“ Have forced a sigh from my heart,

“ It was with me they were in keeping ;

“ To see them is cause of sorrow.”

“ I was not one day alone

“ Until the day of making the grave,

“ Though often have I

“ And you been in solitude.”

“ My sight hath gone from me,

“ At seeing the grave of Naisi ;

“ Shortly will I forsake my life,

“ My folk of lamentation live not.”

“ Since

of Usnach; he was older than they, and is therefore said to have had them in wardship.

O 'f trjmfā do fellāð orċā,
 bġad fa ðaðrujnġ ʒo tujnġeāċ,
 2lf truaġ naċ raġb me j ttaġmajn,
 Sul do maġbað meġc Uġġneāċ.

Truaġ mo tūnuf le feġġuf,
 Do 'm ċelġað don ċraebġuaġð,
 Re bġaċġra blāġċe bġnne,
 Do mellað ġġnnean aen-uajġ.

Do ċrēġġoġ aeġbneġ Ulað, 2ġġ ċġġar ċurað bo tġeġġe,
 ʒġo ġaeġal nġ ba ġaðo,
 'N a n-ðġaġġ ġ aenar meġġe.

2lf mē Deġġoġe ʒan aeġbneġ,
 ġ mē a n-ðeġġeāð mo beġā,
 2l beġċ 'n a n-ðġaġġ óġ mġġe,
 Nġ bġað mġġe ʒo ġaðā.

2ġh-aġġle

* The English Versification, from the literal Translation,
by Mr. WILLIAM LEAHY.

Now weary rolls, to me, each gloomy hour,—
 Now dimly shines, to me, earth's genial ray,—
 For Usnach's noble sons,—alas!—no more Appear, to glad the rising beam of day!

Oh!

" Since it was through me they were betrayed,
 " I will be in tribulation sadly ;
 " It is sad I was not in earth
 " Before the fell death of the sons of Usnach."

" Sorrowful my journey with Fergus,
 " Deceitfully alluring me to the Red Branch ;
 " With flowery sweet words
 " We have been at once beguiled."

" I forsook the delight of Ulad,
 " For the three heroes most beloved ;
 " My life will not be long ;
 " After them, solitary am I."

" I am Deirdri without joy,
 " And I in the end of my life ;
 " Since to be after them is misfortune,
 " I will not be longer."*

After

Oh!—let sorrow every breast inspire!
 With them, how sweet was life!—and I how bless'd!
 The princely offspring of a royal sire;—
 Who made th' unfriended stranger their free guest.

Three

2h-ajle na laejde sijn, do lins Dëjnðne aji niujn Naejfe san ffeirt, acas fuajj baf zan mojl acas do tögbað a hæg öf a leét,
do

Three brindled lions, whose imperial roar,
 Echo'd aloud from Huma's woody height!—

But now the dreadful sound is hear'd no more;
 The falcons of the hill have wing'd their flight!

Three youths divine!—whom Britain's fair admir'd!
 Who ne'er up-rear'd the beamy shield in vain;—
 Receding valour shrunk, with fear inspir'd,—
 And trembling heroes fled the crimson plain!

Three mighty leaders, who disdain'd to yield,—
 Who ne'er, to mortal, servile homage shew'd,
 While their strong hands the brazen spear could wield!
 For whom, in love, th' Ultonion bosom glow'd!

Three lordly bears that rang'd the forest wide,
 And tore th' opposing oaks with fury down!—
 Three rocks unmov'd in battle's furious tide!
 Three chiefs, whose greatest riches was renown!

Three that to Caffa's daughter ow'd their source!—
 Tears for their treach'rous fall shall ever pour!

Three pow'rful props of Cualnia's martial force!
 Three dragons fierce of Monad's lofty tow'r!

After this lay, Deirdri flung herself upon Naisi in the grave, and died forthwith, and stones were laid over their monumental heap; their Ogham

Three, whom the RED BRANCH honor'd 'bove therest;
 They're gone!—and with them all my joys are fled!

Three, that every bloody fray repress'd!
 Three, that in Aífi's warlike school were bred!

Three, whom tributary realms obey'd!
 Three adamantine pillars, that sustain'd
 The slack'ning arm of war;—who forceful stay'd
 The rushing foe,—and the dread fight maintain'd!

Three, that in Dunsky's learned halls were train'd,
 Whom Otha taught to break th' embattled line;—

Whose reach of thought, each noble art attain'd!
 In death's eternal sleep they now recline!

For Naisi's love I fled my royal lord,—
 I fled Ultonia's treasures, throne, and king!

For three for deeds of fame admir'd—ador'd!
 Their lamentable dirge I'll plaintive sing!

And let no earthly being vainly deem,
 That after Naisi I could here delay!

To follow Anly—Ardan chief supreme!
 I'll quickly sink beneath the kindred clay!

То сѣрѣбаѡ апапмана оѡам, асаѣ то сѣраѡ а сслюжѣе саѣнте.

Do

Three that rush'd impetuous o'er the plain!—
He's gone!—he's gone!—My Naisi!—deathlet's name!
Whose slaying blade heap'd high the hills of slain!
O'er his cold corse shall woeful torrents stream!

Oh!—bending o'er the tomb, here let me stay!—
Resume the spade, and make the mansion wide,—
And when I weep my gloomy soul away,—
Then, gen'rous, place me by my Naisi's side!

With them each danger would I gladly share,
And winter's cold, and summer's heat endure;—
Now lamentations pierce the wounded air!
No more upon their shields I lie secure!

No more their radiant spears shall be my bed!
Upraise their steely falchions o'er the grave,
Yet reeking with the blood of hostile dead!—
Around the field, no more they'll deathful wave!

No more the hound, unfetter'd, springs away;
The hawk no more shall guide his deadly aim,
And cautious pounce upon the trembling prey;—
They breathe no more, who lov'd the sportive game!

They

Ogham name was inscribed, and their dirge of lamentation was sung.

S

Cathbad

They breathe no more, who gloried in the chase!
Whom Conall rear'd,—whom heav'nly Maia bore;
Of might, the fury of the foe to face;—
The thunder of the battle rolls no more!

When e'er I cast around my wand'ring eye,—
And the three slips of their three hounds I see,— Forth from my bleeding heart it draws a sigh!
For they,—alas!—were held in care by me!

Naisi!—my life existed but in thine!—
And now thy gen'rous,—mighty soul is flown!
Why should this body long imprison mine?
Why does your Deirdri linger thus alone?

For though full oft from me did Naisi part,
Yet had I then no real cause to mourn:
His bless'd existence fill'd with joy my heart,—
But now he's gone,—ah!—never to return!

Is Naisi, then, in Earth's cold bosom laid?
My sight grows dim,—woe stops my sobbing breath!—
Soon, joyful, will I follow his dear shade,—
My fainting spirit courts th' approach of Death!

None—

Do niallasg Caèbaò d'raì Eimair do eim mje U,hujs do marbaò mite, aji m'cuib fheiguis, acas tar èi Chonéobair do càbair

None—ah! none I leave to mourn my doom!—
 Now fate's impending stroke will not be long;—
 Betray'd by me, they sunk into the tomb!
 There will be none to sing my funeral song!

Ah!—had th' unhappy Deirdri been no more!—
 Ah!—did she sleep within her narrow cell!—
 Ere with false Fergus she left Alba's shore,
 Ere Usna's noble offspring treach'rous fell!

Oh!—how beguil'd!—how woefully deceiv'd!
 To the RED BRANCH, by sweet persuasion brought!
 The sacred seeming promise was believ'd!
 The sons of Usna harbour'd no base thought!

With three belov'd—and gen'rous chiefs to go,
 I fled Ultonia's beauteous scenes,—divine!—
 In cheerless gloom, and solitary woe,
 While painful life continues, now I pine!

No radiant beam of joy my soul receives!
 No friendly tongue can soothe my flowing grief!
 No cold revenge my mighty loss retrieves!
 No human aid can give me now relief!

Oh!--

Cathbad the Druid maledicted Eman, on account of the slaying of the sons of Usnach therein, against the protection of Fergus, and after Conor had

Oh!—Death at length my sinking form invades!
 The vital blood my veins no longer warms;—
 Now—now I join the three great martyr'd shades!—
 Receive me, Naisi, in thy blood-stain'd arms!

There is a natural and striking beauty in this poem, which, perhaps, it may not be impertinent to observe: As Deirdri begins her lamentation with strong and emphatic emotions of extreme sorrow, which she is incapable of restraining; the strain of the poet is, at first, grand and expressive: and also continues so as long as she is able to exert her lamentable powers with energy;—but when, overcome with the insupportable weight of her afflictions, she grows faint in body, and, consequently, feeble in expression:—the strain becomes less pompous, but more pathetic, and there is, as it were, a mournful calm which admirably depicts her approaching dissolution, in every stage of which, she is portrayed in almost inimitable colouring;—in short, the reader is much more affected with the tragic story veiled, as it is, in the beautiful garb of poetry, than if he was really present at the death of Deirdri—so great is the power of the Irish bard. This has been endeavoured at in the English translation.

The Druidical mode of interment in ancient Ireland is described in this tale: A stone was put over the grave and the zabalnt zellað do Chaðbað nác muynfað jat, dá n-ymneað omuðeét omra, acas

 a zabalnt éusse xém. Zleas a dubanne Caðbað xóð ná bjað Emajn az Conéubar, na az aentujne d' á fljét, ó'n xhynnasyl xjn amaé, zo brujne an bráta, acas do b' xhjn xjn, ó'n nj rajð Emajn az Conéubar, na

the name of the person interred was inscribed in the hieroglyphic virgular characters used by the Druids; of which kind of inscriptions numerous instances are daily discovered in Erin, but none, I believe, upon any of Mr.
 M'Pherson's "grey stone," in ALBA, or modern SCOTLAND.
 When we colonized Alba, which has got the name of Scot- land from us, that is in the sixth century, Christianity, not Druidism, was established. This particular passage is sufficient to shew the factitious scheme of Mr. M'Pherson, who always puts down for our OGHAM INSCRIPTION his "grey stone," because they are always on granite. He affects the establishment of an utter impossibility, that is, that an utter ignorance of literature could produce a stupendous work of GREAT literary magnitude. Let not the literary world be any longer in error. From those who wrote the originals which he perverted, it was that he learnt to be singular and extravagant, and this is what made him "a lasting reputation and a name;" but they were neither ignorant nor illiterate;
 they were the oldest literary people in Europe, our poets and historians. Ours is a fine original tongue, of which the dialect of Alba is a debased corruption.

had given his promise to Cathbad that he would not slay them, if he would practise enchantment upon them, and bring them to himself. And Cathbad said moreover, that neither Conor nor any one of his descent should possess Eman from this paradise forth, to the bosom of eternity; and that has been verified, for neither Conor nor any of his race

At the conclusion of this tale, told in the assembly, there is a traditional relation always added. It is said that king Conor was so incensed that Naisi and Deirdri should, even in death, inhabit the mansion of the grave together, ordered them to be far separated in the ground of burial. It is also said, that on every morning, for some days, the graves would be found open, and Naisi and Deirdri found together in one. It is asserted, that Conor then ordered that stakes of yew should be driven severally through their bodies, in order to keep them for ever asunder. The marvelous fiction is then extended to an extravagant length, by telling that two yew trees grew from these stakes, which, as yew is considered the longest living tree, were stated to have grown to such a height as to embrace each other over the cathedral of Armagh, in ages after the tragical circumstance occurred. All generous minds are gratefully affected with poetic fiction. The gentlemen of the Highland Society have not been ignorant of the tradition respecting the yew trees, as it is mentioned in their publication of 1805. Romantic stories were the substitutes with our ancestors for dramatic composition.

na ag aenoune t' a fliet o' fhuille. ag fhuille cloinne Ughis to nuge seo.

* We have already observed, that the breach of Fergus's guaranty occasioned him to fly the court of his nephew Conor. He resorted that of Cruachan, in Conaght, where reigned MEVIA, (or MEY, as neatly expressed by the Albano-scotic Highland Society;) then queen of Conaght, and long in enmity with Conor of Ulster. With the influence of Fergus, she was able to excite all the rest of Ireland to a war against Ulster, which did not terminate until the destruction of Eman, which forms a grand epoch in ancient Irish history. The poetically embellished details of this desperate war will constitute a principal part of our next publication. A vast deal of poetic fiction is mixed by our old poets with their details of absolute historic facts. "Sed omnia antiquitus fabulosa,"—"all antiquity is fabulous." From ancient documents of this nature, however, it is limited, if not ignorant fastidiousness to scorn all endeavour at enucleating truth.

† This is a manner of terminating our stories in old manuscripts. The obvious cause is to prevent mistake, as well as to call attention back to the poetic or historic detail. The old manuscripts are so closely written, that it is not easy to distinguish their several tracts without such marks; and next, it is suggested, that one reading is not sufficient to appreciate the value of a composition race possessed Eman from that time to this.*

Such is the sorrowful tale of the children of Usnach.†

We have gone through this poetico-dramatic tale, founded on fact, of which the reader is left at liberty to form his own judgment, and which he will form, whether we will or not. But now we come to compare it directly with Mr. M<sup>c</sup>Pherson's Darthula, and here the argument is of brief decision. Falshood cannot stand against truth, no more than anachronism can against the range of circumstantial history.

Our story is very different from Mr. M<sup>c</sup>Pherson's. Ours has been written at least since the sixth century; but I can confidently assert, that his was never written, or "handed down by tradition," in the form in which he gives it, before he indited his argument. Usnoth was not lord of Eta, but Usnach was an Ulster noble, and his sons, Naisi, Ainli, and Ardan, after their flight, settled on the borders of the lake of Eitche, which, I allow, is his, Loch-Eta, an arm of the sea in Loarn. These young heroes were not the "nephews of the celebrated Cuchullan, by his sister Slessama;" nor do we find he had any such fanciful sister: but they they were the sons of Ailbhi, one of the daughters of (Cathbad) Caffa the Druid; while Cuchullan was the son of Deitchin, another daughter, by Subaltam (not Semo) his father, lord of Dudalgan, (now Dundalk,) and so he and the sons of Usnach were cousin-germans. They were not sent from Alba then to be educated by the famed Cuchullan in arms; but, as may be gathered from Deirdri's lamentation, they are said to be reared with Aifi in the military school of Sky, where Cuchullan himself, and their other cousin-german, the famous Conall Carnach, the son of Fincaemh, another daughter of Caffa, is said also to have been educated. As for the Cairbar, here mentioned, he did not exist for near three centuries after the sons of Usnach, Cuchullan and Conall Carnach; nor was he then an usurper of the throne of Cormac, but the son and lawful successor of that monarch, who, after a long and prosperous reign, choosing to enjoy tranquillity and retirement, resigned his sovereignty to Cairbar his son, who in the year of Christ, 295, engaged the Finnian heroes in the memorable battle of Gabhra, where he and the renowned Oscar, son of Oisin, son of Finn, son of Cumhal, (the Fingal of Mr. M'Pherson,) encountering each other, fell by mutual wounds.

The

The occasion of Cairbar's engaging in this battle was to avenge Finn's desertion of his grand-father Art, in the battle of the plain of Moycroy, wherein he was deprived of his life and crown by Luigh Mac Con, another Irish prince, who was supported by some British auxiliaries, as will be detailed more at large in its proper place.

Deirdri (not Darthula) was not, as we have seen, the daughter of Colla, as Mr. M'Pherson says, but of Feilim, son of Dal or Dela; nor is the ideal tower or castle of Selama (how like the other airy tower of Selma) at all mentioned. These pretty names may be useful in a work of fancy, such as Mr. M'Pherson's Darthula, whose drift was suggested by the story which we have faithfully translated, and of which the Highland Society of Scotland have a very fine old copy on vellum, acknowledged to have been written so long ago as the twelfth century. The publication of which would confirm the truth of what is here insisted upon. There is no mention in Irish history of any other renowned personages of the name of Colla, but of three brothers, sovereign princes, who lived in the beginning of the fourth century; Colla Uais, Colla-da-Chrioch, and Colla

Menn, none of whom could have been contemporary with Conor Mac Nessa, or the sons of Usnach. But as Colla is a soft poetic name, it answered Mr. M'Pherson's purpose, and saved him the trouble of invention, to which he was obliged to resort upon numerous other occasions, and which, in this case, seems to have given him trouble, and to have run him quite closely, as in the instances of Selma and Selama. But it is no wonder that a man, who was so very deeply engaged in a more extensive field of invention, should spare himself trouble on such less material occasions, at least in his opinion. He had to invent imaginary circumstances, as well as to bring together men, and their deeds, who lived at far distant periods, and a few fictitious names of men and places, were trifling links in his chain of fabrication. Had he nothing more than unsteady tradition to encounter, as he would fain impress, any inadvertency of this kind would have been indeed immaterial: but as, in fact, he stands opposed by the indubitable ancient written records of the most cultivated and accurate language upon earth, these careless inadvertencies are fatal. For names are in history as landmarks, which cannot be removed or falsified without sacrilegious violence, destroying the founded principles principles of established truth, and substituting in their room the fanciful pillars of imposing fabrication. Such spurious imposition, however, is easily detected by the eye of intelligent investigation, and original right is restored to the contemplation of unprejudiced judgment.

Mr. M'Pherson, although forming a new system, treading in the footsteps of his predecessors, Buchanan, Fordun, M'Kenzie, &c. thought proper to blend the genuine truth with imaginary fiction, wherefore he relates that "the three brothers, after "defending themselves for some time, with great
 "bravery, were overpowered and slain." This is the fact according to our poetic tale, but it is not equally true that "the unfortunate Deirdri (not Darthula) killed herself on the body of her beloved
 "Naisi," (not Nathos.) The tale tells that she threw herself on his body, and instantly expired, as she predicted in her lamentation. In the true history she is said to have thrown herself out of Conor's chariot, and to have broken her skull against a rock; and even this must be considered accidental death, rather than suicide. It is true that suicide was unknown in those early times; but it must be observed, that what is here fastidiously called called "common tradition," is the irrefragable authority of Irish history, which is every where mauled, mangled, mutilated, perverted, destroyed, and confounded in all possible instances by the subtle and dexterous ingenuity of this ingenuous gentleman, while it must be insisted upon, that he and his countrymen, if this be discarded, have no history or literature of more than three hundred years standing; and even this latter not their own, but a paltry loan from the modern English funds.

Now let us investigate the poem itself, as given by Mr. M'Pherson.

Whatever merit the address to the moon may possess, must wholly be attributed to Mr. M'Pherson. It savours much more of modern than of ancient poetry. The Greek and Roman poets make several fine allusions to the moon and other heavenly bodies; they derive elegantly impressive similitudes from them:—so do our ancient poets, of whom none addresses them at this rhapsodical circumstantial length. The sacred captain-general, Joshua himself, when his mind was divinely elevated, addressed the sun and moon only
with

with limitation to certain places, when he said, “Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon, and thou Moon,
 “in the valley of Ajalon.” Josh. x. v. 12.

This address, indeed, might have been suggested by Deirdri’s notice of the boding cloud, but it is much and finely enlarged upon. The picture is great, sublime, and impressive ; but it is all Mr. M’Pherson’s, who never fails to borrow a tint from any author, ancient or modern, who may furnish an idea of embellishment. Who does not meet the shade of Shakespeare twinkling in the following sentiment ?—“ But thou thyself shalt fail one night ;
 “ and leave thy blue path in heaven :”

“ The cloud capp’d towers, the gorgeous palaces,
 “ The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
 “ Yea, all that it inherit, shall dissolve,
 “ And, like the baseless fabric of a vision,
 “ Leave not a wreck behind.”

SHAKESPEARE.

We always had, notwithstanding the respectable Dr. Shaw’s idea to the contrary, a conception of the audacious imposture of a publication of the pretended originals of Mr. M’Pherson’s poems of Ossian. I call them Mr. M’Pherson’s poems of Ossian particularly, as such never existed in the shape

shape and form in which he has given them, previously to his management, and before this new-fangled post-original translation, in ignorant, unmetrical, corrupt Erse, to the eternal disgrace, though undoubtedly intended for the lasting honour—of Scotland! It is true, some specimens of this kind of nauseously irregular rhapsody were, from time, since the publication of Mr. M'Pherson's Lucubrations, obtruded on the public as part of his feigned original, for the purpose of trying the pulse of the Irish; and when it was found that they passed in unnoticed contempt, it was confidently believed that Irish literature had expired without a solitary vindicator of its rights. Nothing else could have induced the ushering forth of this monstrous fabrication. Indeed we know that a similar conception of the decline of Irish learning, suggested to Mr. M'Pherson himself, the feasible success of that contrivance, which has deservedly and undeservedly gained him "a lasting reputation and a name." He deserves the highest worldly applause for that genuine scheme which has captivated the generous taste of all literary people; but he truly merits, and has surely incurred the reprobation of dignified, pure, historic truth, while he remains a lasting monument of clumsily contrived, of designed and systematic falsehood.

Many of my countrymen, far more able than myself, have attacked this many-headed wily monster of Scottish generation ; but they hurled the weapons of abstract reasoning only, which were eluded by the shield of sophistical deception. But I come in the simple, defensive armour of comparative fact, while my offensive weapons are historic truth, a professed acquaintance with my native language ; with all that the destructive wrecks of time and war have left in it for contemplation ; and with a critically accurate knowledge of its most abstruse, difficult, sublime and elegant poetry.

The profound conjecture of the deep contemplative mind of Dr. Johnson, that, “ if any thing like “ originals, for Mr. M'Pherson's poems of Ossian “ existed, it must be found in Ireland,” is like Sir Isaac Newton's supposition of the highly inflammable quality of diamond. Both opinions stand now on incontestable ground ; the former, on fact, now to be acknowledged, and the latter proved by unquestionable experiment.

We will now depart from Mr. M'Pherson until after giving the old historic tale of Deirdri. We shall then compare the late monstrous fabrication which bears bears his sanction, as the original of his Ossian, with some native fragments of that wildly-sublime Irish Bard, whoever he was, who wrote those pieces of which we have abundance to produce. Then will Mr. M'Pherson be exhibited in his own colours.

Here follows the historic tale of the children of Usnach, which from the language must be of the earliest age of Irish literature: it is given without comment, except in a very few instances where italics are introduced, in order to leave the reader to his own judgment, as to the antiquity, &c. &c.

Please when did the writer get this?

THE ANCIENT HISTORIC

TALE

OF THE

DEATH OF THE

CHILDREN OF USNACH.

LOJN'GES 912LE n-UJN'JĒ.

CJĎ DJA mbuj lojngeaꝥ mac n-UJN'JĒ? NĪ anꝥan. bhadari hullað ac ol a tĳ feo-ljmĳð mĳe dajll ꝥeelaĳĳ Concubari. buj dan bean juð fheðljmĳð ĳĳn ac aꝥnecc don tꝥluag of a cĳnð acaꝥ ĳĳ tonaé. Tairnĳcell éorĳn acaꝥ éubꝥeĳn, acaꝥ nð laꝥatt ĳarĳ meuꝥeoo.

Al mbatar do leꝥtugað. Lujð ĳĳ ben dĳ au hĳmðar. Alc dul dĳ dan lāĳ ĳĳ tĳĳe nð ĳꝥé ĳĳ lenur ĳĳ a bꝥuĳn co cloꝥ ꝥo'n leꝥ ulĳ. Alttarĳ ceé ꝥeꝥ dĳ alalju ĳĳ ĳĳ tĳĳ laꝥ an ĳꝥeꝥ co mꝥatar cĳn an
éĳn. ĳĳ anĳ hĳðururĳt Aléteo mac Alĳllu, nā euĳĳð cor dĳb a beca. Tuetar éucĳĳn ĳĳ ben ol ꝥe co ꝥarĳmaĳ cĳð dĳa tā

HISTORIC TALE

OF THE

DEATH OF THE CHILDREN OF USNACH.

WHENCE the banishment of the sons of Usnach? Not difficult. The Ulster nobles were feasting in the mansion of Felim, son of Dall, Conor's story-teller. Then was the wife of this Felim, at attendance upon the multitude (of guests) over them, and she heavily pregnant. Goblets and coviviality go about, and they uttered noise of exhilaration.

They were about going to bed. The lady was moving towards her bed. As she passed through the midst of the house, the child screamed in her womb, so as to be heard entirely throughout the fort. Every man ran from his quarters in the house till they were all together. Here Atchy, son to Allil, exclaimed, " Stir not youths, let the woman

" be

"be brought to us," says he, "that we may know
 "whence is this noise of alarm." The woman was then brought to them. Then said Felim, her husband, what violent noise is it that spreads alarm through the house, woman, saith he; it sounds from thy womb; roars from thy comprehension; ears hear it; a gleam of strong light is its similitude. Many an individual within its compass. My hardy blood it wounds. Then she resorted to Cathbad, for he was a man of intelligence. Then Cathbad said, "Listen unto Cathbad of mild generosity, civil, a great mild chief, magnified, exalted through science of Druidism." Then Felim said, "Since mine are not the fair words of explaining knowledge, as women I understand not; what in concealment within thy womb screamed so loud." Then Cathbad said, "under the girdle round thy "womb hath screamed a female infant of shin"ing yellow hair, of poignant eyes, of ears
 "sensitive to sound; her cheek of purple red,
 "with the colour of snow; I compare her teeth to
 "pearls; I identify her lips to strawberries; a "virgin from whom shall arise many misfortunes to
 "the Ultonians: Within she fatalizes; in your womb
 "loud speaks a virgin fair, comely and limber-
 "haired: Many heroes shall contend, many a
 "sovereign

այրոյն յարհայճօտ, իյայ յարար տրամտոն:
 շայծ քօւլ ճօրեյծ Շոնճւծայր, իյայ ա եօյլ րարարիցօքն յմ ա յճալ նետնտօ քրի արարմոյն այր-նչօ քրի ա քրի յօյրայ յօյրայն.

Չօրա՛ յարհայճոյ յն Շաճա՛ծ ա լան քօր իյու նա մնա, ճար ո՛ յօ յարարար յն լեւծ քօ ա լայն. Բն, օր քօ, յն յն քի ան, աքա
 իյո Չարօք ա իյարն, աքա իյայ օլեք արար.
 Չաքա յօ ճարար յն յն յն յարան, աքա
 քիքն Շաճա՛ծ լայծ:

Չ Չարօք մա յօքնա մար,
 Չարար քօքարե՛ք լօճան;
 Շարարար Սլա՛ծ քօ՛ քօ,
 Չ յն յն քի յն քիքն.

Իյայ քօքն Շա՛ յարար,
 Չօ՛ յայն ա ի՛ք քի լարար;
 Ի յն արար լարար քօ,
 Լարարար քի մաք յն-Արար.

Ի ա՛ արար, ճարն յարար,
 Շարար յարար յն արար;

“ sovereign shall seek ; she shall be reared on the “ wealth of the heavy produce of Conor’s province.
 “ Her lips will be strawberry red over her splendid “ teeth. Sovereign princes will be violently cap“ tivated by her beauteous bright form.”

After this Cathbad laid his hand on the womb of the woman, in such manner, that the infant sprung beneath his hand. “ True,” says he, “ a “ daughter it is, and let Deirdri be her name, and “ evil will come of her.” And the female child was born forthwith, and Cathbad spoke this lay :

O ! Deirdri, on whose account there shall be great weeping,
 Whom groupes of women will envy ;
 The Ultonians will be afflicted in thy time,
 O daughter fair of Feilim !—

Many will be jealous, hereafter,
 Of thy face, O virgin, of flaming beauty ;
 It is in your time heard shall be
 The banishment of the three sons of Usnach.

It is in your time a deed of wrath
 Will be hereafter perpetrated in Eman ;

There

bjo at dñeé coll, cjo jartajn,
Do foetçat mje nje nozmajn.

İ tñut, a bē combajl,
Lujngjuç ferçuça o Ullcajb,
Acaç žijn an coēmçat tajl,
Žujn fjača, nje Cončubajn.

İ at ějn, a bē combajl,
Žujn Erge nje Mladajn,
Acaç žijn nat luža ţmačt, Oržajn Eožajn nje Durnčačt.

Do dena žijn igrauna nğarž,
Ar fejðjm nje n'Ulad nað arð;
bjað do lečtān mač dū,
bjo ţečl narðjrec a Dhejnðrju.

Harðčar jno jngen, ol jno ojeç. Nječ, ol Cončubajn, berðar lujngjo jno jngen
jmbuaruē, acaç ašţjeçr tom tom rejn ţejn, acaç bjo ţj ben bjaç jm ţharjuð. Acaç nj no lamçat Ulad acojeçer: Do žujto on amlajð jarnim, co mbo ţj jngen. İ mōrālljm

There is objection in thy visage, tho' it be hereafter
That shall destroy a prince's mighty sons.

'Tis in thy destiny, O! virgin of beauty,
The banishment of Fergus from Ulster,
And the deed that hath contracted disgrace,
The mortal wound of Fiacra, son of Conor.

'Tis in thy fate, O! virgin of beauty,
The wound of Ergi, son of Illadan,
And a deed of no less punishment,
The destruction of Eogan, son of Duthrecht.

There shall be wrought a deed, foul and fierce,
Under the influence of the king of Ulster, of high accomplishments;
Your little heap shall be not in its due place,
Thou shalt be, a tale wondrous, O! Deirdri.

Let the female child be killed, say the young men. Not so, saith Conor, the female child shall be taken by me to-morrow, and she shall be reared at my own accord, and shall be the woman (wife) who will be with me, (my companion.) And Ulster dared not counsel him to the contrary: The thing was done so consequently, and she became buŷ juo Երյա, a Լէք քօ Լէ՛ յօ ոալշ Եօ ոա՛ն քալե՛ցո ոե՛ն Ժ՛Ալլալո՛ ճաք յի տալ ոօ քօաԺ

 Լա ԿօնԵւար, աԵաք ոյ՛ Բնյ ոե՛ն ոօ Լեճոյ
 Կ յիո ԼԿ ա՛ճշ a Կ՛օյթէ; աԵաք a միյմյա ոա Կ՛յնցու ոօն, աԵաք ԼեՅարճամ ալ ոա Կ՛ճշաճաԲալ յԿիժ, ալ Բա Բանճայնտէ.

Բե՛ճշաք յի ու Կ Կ՛ալլալ աճ քեմուժ Լօյճ քօճԼալ քօր ղի ղե՛ճշա առօյճ Կ յի ոճամ-ոյնճ յա քիւնյ յԿ յօ ոքիաԿօյ ոյ յի քիա՛ն
 Կյեճ օլ յա քօլա քօր ղի ղե՛ճշա. Կ առ
 Կքերտ ղի քիյա ԼեՅարճամ ոօ Բաժ յիմայ Եմ քեր քօրք՛ մեճոյ ոա տօրա յաժօ աԵու, յօժօն, յի քօլտ առայլ յի քիա՛ն, աԵաք յի ճիւայժ առայլ յի քիւնյ, աԵաք յի Եօրք առայլ յի ղե՛ճշա. Օրժան աԵաք տօճաժ յիւք, ալ ԼեՅարճամ, ոյ՛ Եյան ալք, աժա Կյ յօյճ Կյ քարուժ, յօժօն Նօյլ մաԵ Աքնե՛ն ՆյմԲամ ղլան ղլալ առ, օլ ղի, Եօն քաԵալ.

Բե՛ճշ ոաոժ յի ու ղի յի ղի Նօյլ a աԵն քօր յօն յի առաժայնա, Կ՛Եմո Կյ ալ յօրժ—Բա Կնի յիօրո յի յօրժ մաԵ ո-Աքնե՛ն. Եե՛ն Բօ աԵաք Եե՛ն ոյժօլ աժ Ելոյն ոօ մեկնոյն յա տրան մեկնոյն յօքերայժ, Եե՛ն յիւն ոօ Ելոյն Բաժօր ղեճայնժ աԵաք օրքիճ

the most beautiful young woman in Ireland. It was in a lone fort she was nursed, so that she saw not one of the Ultonians until she was betrothed to Conor ; and there was not let into the fort but the young lady's tutor and nurse particularly, and Levarcam, who acted as an intervening messenger, for she was a conversation woman, (a poetess.)

On a time then her tutor was slaying a veal calf in the snow, outside in the winter, to prepare food for her, she saw a raven drinking the blood in the snow : Then she says to Levarcam—Lovely truly would the man be who were marked with those three colours ; that is, the hair like the raven, and the cheek like the blood, and the body like the snow. Designation and choice are yours, says Levarcam, not far from you ; he is in the house with you, namely, Naisi, son of Usnach. I cannot be well a day then, says she, till I see him.

On a time, then, this very Naisi was quite alone on the plains of Eman, playing on a musical instrument—sweet truly was the music of the sons of Usnach. Every cow or other animal that heard it, used to milk two-thirds more than usual ; every human being who heard it, was overcome with the delight

delight of its harmony.—Their valour too was transcendent. Though Conor's province should be about them in one place, when each set his back to the other, they would not overcome them, so superior was their action and defence. They were as fleet as hounds at chase; they slew deer with their speed.

As Naisi, in particular, was alone abroad, Deirdri threw herself in his way, and as she passed by, uttered not a word. "Mild is the dame who passeth by," says he. "It is natural for damsels to be mild where there are no youths," says she. "The man of the province is with you," says he. "I would make a choice between you both," says she, "and would prefer a young man such as you." "Not so," says he, "though it is in consequence of apprehension." "It is for avoidance of me thou sayest that," says she. "Be it so then," says he. With this she flung a ball at him, which struck his head. "A stroke of disgrace through life's extent is this," says she, "if you take me not." "Depart from me, woman," says he. "Thou wilt be in disgrace," says she. With this she took his instrument and played. When Ulster heard the music in that quarter, every man of them separated separated from the other. The sons of Uslina rushed forth to remonstrate with their brother. "What are you about," say they, "is not there the fated destruction of Ulster?" Then he told them what had passed with him. "Evil will come of it," say the youths. "Although there should, I will be in disgrace while I live. We will go with her to another country. There is not in Erin a king who will not give us welcome." They then held a council, and departed that night with three times fifty men of might; and three times fifty women, and three times fifty greyhounds, and three times fifty attendants, and Deirdri like another among them. They were at shiftings all around Erin, and in danger of being cut off frequently by the devices of Conor, from Esro (Ballyshanon) round Erin, south-west, and to Binedar, (Hozoth), north-east again. However, at length they sailed by Ulster into the region of Alba, (modern Scotland), and settled in a wild therein. When the chase of the mountain failed them, they fell upon the cattle of the men of Alba. These assembled to extirpate them in one day. They resorted to the king of Alba, who took them in his friendship, and admitted them into military service.

On a particular time, then, the king's steward went on a morning early, and made a circuit round this mansion, and saw the couple asleep. He after went and awoke the king. "We have not found a wife meet for you until this day. There is in the bed of Naisi, son of Usnach, a woman meet for the sovereign of the west of the world. Let Naisi himself be at once killed, and espouse the damsel thyself," says the steward. "No," says the king, "but go thou to solicit her privately." It is done so. The steward communicates with her towards night. She informs her husband of it that night upon the first opportunity; so that the thing was not accomplished. It was then given in command to the sons of Usnach to go into dangers and battles and difficulties, in expectation that they might be slain in such engagements. The men of Alba were assembled to slay them by his orders besides. She informed Naisi: "Hence away," says she, "if you go not off to-night, you will be slain to-morrow." They departed thence that night, and went into a sea-girt isle. This was made known to the Ultonians.

"It is a pity, O! Conor," said Ulster, "that the sons of Usnach should fall in an enemy's Y "region,

“ region, on account of a blameable woman. It “ were better to confine, and support them, and “ to slay them on coming to their own country, “ than that they should fall by their foes.” Let “ them come then,” says Conor, “ and let it be
 “ to obedience. Let this fact be made known to “ them.” “ We delight in this,” said they, and “ will send to them, and let Fergus enter into “ guaranty with us, and Dubthach, and Cormac, “ son of Conor. Let them come till we take them “ into hand from beyond sea.” It was afterwards enjoined on Fergus, by design of Conor, to go to a feast, and that the sons of Usnach should give solemn asseveration that they would not partake of Erin’s food before the food of Conor. Then Fiach, son of Conor, went with Fergus along with them ;
 and Fergus and Dubthach tarried ; and the sons of Usnach hastened until they were on the plain of Eman.

Then came Eogan, son of Duthrect, king of Fermanagh, to submit to Conor ; for he had been at enmity with him for a great while. It was he who was sent to slay them, at the head of Conor’s soldiery, that they should not come unto himself. The sons of Usnach were then standing on the green of Eman, and the soldiery sitting.

Luſtē don božen succo jnāſaj jn ſj ſajčē. Do luſtō jmorjo mac ſerſuſo co m-buſ ſor leč laſjñ Noſjñ. ſerujō ſrjñ la bējñ ſer-gamo do ſaj mor jñ Noſjñ cu jo jmjō a drijñ tñjō. ſo cept laſōdijñ
 mac ſerſuſa, co tuc a dō lājñ tar Naſjñ, co tuc ſora acas tajñſ a n-uas, acas
 jñññe jo bje tpe mac ſerſuſa hñ n-uas, acas jo marbēa jarnñ ſečñon nñ ſajčē
 co na tōjñō aſ ačt a nočēajō do jññ
 ſaj acas do ſjññ clajōjñ, acas tucad Dajōjñ hñ jñññō do Corēōbajñ co m-buſ ſor a lājñ. No ēujñjēčj a lājñō jn na cu! Že c'as do ſerſuſ jarnñ hñ nñ ſjñ, acas do Dubčāč acas Čormac. Čačtuc ſjōe con do jñññac ſjññō mōjo ſo ēčt-uajñ, jōon, Dubčāč do marbatō ſjajñe mac Cončōbajñ, acas ſjačñō mac ſečōljñjō mac
 jñjñe Čonēōbajñ do ſjññ don oen ſorſom, acas ſerſuſ do ma bač Čraſj tpeon mac Čraſjlečajñ, acas ſarujad Čonēubajñ jñpaſb, acas cač do čaubajñt etarajb jarnñ
 jñ jñ oen leu, co jñpocračar tñj ēčt do Uſtēajb eta jñ, acas Čñajñ dñ luſčcačō do ſerſuſ. J, ad lečar jarnñ co hžlj l acas co ſerſuſ; an ſuſ ſečacatar ba ſj lañññajñ do ſečēat, acas don jñſja ču ſerſuſ

sitting. Eogan then hastily approached solely on the lawn. Fergus's son moved up and took one hand of Naisi. He salutes them with a furious blow of a large javelin, piercing Naisi therewith, so that it came out at his back. At this the son of Fergus threw both his arms around Naisi, so as to put them around him above and below; and so was Naisi slain down through the son of Fergus; and after this were the troops slain all over the lawn, so that none escaped, except only such as made their way by the point of javelin, or the wound of sword; and Deirdri was handed over to Conor. Her hands were bound behind her back. All this was directly conveyed to Fergus, as well as to Cormac and Dubthach. They move on at once to do desperate deeds. Dubthach slew Maini, son of Conor; and Fiachna, son of Feilim, Conor's daughter's son, was wounded at the same time; and Fergus slew Tragatren, son of Tragletan; and Conor was put to flight by them; and a battle was fought between them on the same day, in which three hundred of the Ultonians were slain between them; and Eman was burnt by Fergus. Where they went after was to Allil and Mey; for they knew that they were a couple that would kindly receive them; and that they were not affectionately disposed

բայց Եւ ԿԱՆՏԱՅԻ; Երբ՝ զՍԵՐՈՒՄ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ

Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ

Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ

Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ

Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ
 Եւ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ ԵՒ ԵՐԵՎԱՆԻ

disposed towards Ulster; thirty hundred was the amount of their adherents into exile. To the end of sixteen years, wailing and hot anguish ceased not in Ulster, but there were wailing and hot anguish every night.

Deirdri was for a year indeed in the bed of Conor, and during that year she neither smiled nor laughed, nor took sufficiency of food, drink, or sleep, nor raised her head from her knee. When musicians would attend at her mansion, then would she utter this rhapsody :

Lament ye the mighty warriors,
Assassinated in Eman on coming !
Stately would they arrive at home,
The three mighty sons of Usnach.

Naisi, companion accomplished, mild,
Lament him at once with me ;
Ardan, subduer of the luxurious boar,
Bewail Andli of mighty vigour.

Tho' sweet to you the mellow mead
Drank by the son of Nessa voluptuous,
Ever

ba haþonjm njan nejm xop bju,
bjað macc no bað mjllju.

O no xeruat Nojki nār, Fuluét xop xeðuþ xianclār,
ba mjlljum gaé bjuð xo mj
Zli aralað me Uxljum.

Cjo bjmjm lþ an cajne,
Cufljumjuð k coruajre;
K j mu cubuþ do 'n nē,
Ro cualo ceol buð bjnoþ.

bjnn la Conéoban jn nē, Cufljumjuð k coruajrē;
ba bjmjm lem-xo cloč nell,
Sjan no zejðeþ me Uxlenn.

foðan zujmjm trom Nojki,
ba ceol bjnn a bjðcloki;
Cobla Zlitājn xo buð majē, foðjuð Zjnnlj d'a urboþē.

Nojki do nomuð a xheþe,
ba ðjnjm jn comuþeét;

Ever more delightful to me thro' life,
The fare of the sons was sweeter.

Whenever mighty Naisi would set out
To hunt the woods, the fair wide plains,
Every food was more delicious than honey
Caught by the sons of Usnach.

Tho' sweeter to you is the dirge
Of pipes and horn trumpets ;
It is my assurance to the king,
I heard more melodious music.

Delightful to Conoꝛ, the king,
Are pipes and trumpets ;
More delightful to me the airy strain,
The melody sung by the sons of Usnach.

Deep sound of surge was Naisi,
Sweet music was its constant hearing ;
Ardan's voice was truly excellent,
And Ainli's sounding song towards his green booth.

Naisi's grave has been made,
Sorrowful indeed was its consequence ;

Do podaluq dponq trja alt,
Do 'n djq tonnajq dja n-erbalc.

Imnujn berčan ajlle bla, Tučtač dujnne cjo dymbła;
ba djqjn na tpeřco j n-jum!—
Mac Uřnjq dojo najoju!—

Imnujn cobřujō ēaji,
Imnaji oglan apd jmnaji;
Jari n-jmtečt řjuō mojqj řajl,
Imnujn cuřtao hj tjuřnaji.

Imnujn řujl žlař ēarōjq mna,
ba h-amnař řmj h-ččtra;
Jari euarč cořlj comull řoer,
Imnujn a norud trja tubraen.

Nj colla trja,
Zleař mj corera mj n-žne;
řojte nj toed jm ajne,
Or na tajdeč mjcc Uřle.

Nj collaō
Leč na hařčče jm luřju;

He supplied numbers, by might,
Of waving beverage, in their slaughter.

Delightful their birth of most beauteous bloom,
Whose manhood rose to highest vigour ;
How sad the consequence to-day !—
The sons of Usnach have been immolated !—

Dear their sweet converse,
Dear their youthful vigour of high might ;
In their passage thro' the plain of Fál, (Erin,) Welcome was the approach of their valorous prowess.

Dear their blue eyes, that fair ones loved,
They were admired in their peregrinations ;
On searching round the forest in liberal sport,
Delightful their movement o'er the dusky moor.

I sleep not at any time,
And my complexion is not blooming ;
Sounds of exultation affect me not,
Since the sons of Usnach come not.

I sleep not Half the night as I lie ;

My

ԿՕ ՇԵՐԾ ՄՕ ՇԵՂԼ ԵՄ ԾՐԱՆՃՕ, ՏԵՇ ԵՂ ԼԱՆՃՕ ԵՂԵԽՅԱ.

ԲԱՅԵՂ ԽՂ ԵՂՄԻՆ ԵՂ ԾՕՄ ԱՅՄ, ԵՂ ՈՒՅԼ ԼԵՄՈ ԵՐԵՇԱՐ ԳԱՅՄ; ՆՂ Ա ԳՂԾ ՈՂ ԳԱԾՕ ՈՂ ԳՂՄԻ, ՆՂ Ա ԵՇՇ ՄԱՐ ՈՂ ԸՄԾԱՇ ԵՂՃ.

ՁԼ ԵՂ ՄԱՆ ԾՕՆ ԵՂՂ ԸՈՆՇՅԱՐ ԱՇԱ ԽԱՂԾՈՒԾԱԾ
ԳԼ Խ ԱՆԽՅՈՂ ԱԾ ԵՂԵՂՇ ԳՂ ԱՆ ԵՐԸՆԻՂ-ԳՂ ԳՂԽ:

ՁԼ ԸՈՆՇՅԱՅՄ, ՇՂԾ ՈՐԾ ԵՂՂ
ԾԱ ԵՂՐՄԱՅԻ ԾԱՄ ԵՂՐՈՆ ԿՕ ՇՕՂ, Խ ԵՇԾ ԵՂ ՇԵՂԼ ՇԵՂԼ ՈՒ ՄԱՅՄ, ԾՕ ԳՇԸԼ ԼՅՄ ԵՂ ԵՂԱՅՄ.

ՆՂ ՈՐԾ ԱՂԼՂ ԼԵՄ ԿՕ ԵՂՄԻ, ՁԼԵՂ ԵՂ ՈՐԾ ԵՂՄԱՅՄԵԾ,
ԵՂԸՍԻՂ ԱՅՄ,—ՄՕՐ ԵՂ ԵՇԾ,— ԸՈՆԱՇ ԱՇԵԽԵՂԱ ՇՕՄ ԵՂ.

ՁԼ ԵՂՂԻՍԻՂ Խ ԾՕՐԳՂ ԼՅՄ, ԵՇՇՇ ԵՂ ԱՄԱՐ ՄՅԸ ԵՂ-ԱՂԼՅԱՆԻ; ՇՅՐԻՆ ԸՂՐԾՅԱԾ ԾԱՐ ՇՕՐՐ ԵՂ-ԸԸԼ, ԵՂ ԳՂԱՇՆՂԾԸ ԳՇՇ ԵՂ.

My senses are scattered away,
Nor do I relish food or drink.

Welcome to me are not to-day,
The cordial liquors quaff'd by nobles ;
Nor ease, nor comfort, nor delight,
Nor splendid mansion, nor palace of a king.

When Conor was endeavouring to sooth her, it was then she uttered the following dirge:

O! Conor, tho' thou be Soliciting me from my sorrow and weeping,
It is my fate while I live,
The tale to me is not acceptable.

What was most beauteous to me beneath the sky,
And what was most lovely to me,
Thou hast taken from me,—great the anguish,—
I shall not get healed of it to my death.

The affliction that is sadness to me,
The coming of the slaughter of Usnach's sons through me ;
Black corses made of their fair frames,
That were splendid above numbers.

Da ngruað corpera eajne frat,
 bēst derz, abra ʒo dael dač;
 Dēozin nemonita ʒo oʒ, Almajl ʒēo dač ʒnečtaʒo.

ba ʒuačnað a epnað ʒlan, Ičn ʒhjanu ʒer n-Alban;
 ʒuan eajm corpera, cumtač eōʒn,
 Cona tʒmtačmuʒnz derzōʒn.

Inar ʒnōlto,—ʒēo co mbrʒz,
 I mbuʒ cētta nʒem ʒlanʒn;
 ʒon a mʒdenum ʒ ʒle,
 Caeco uʒnz o' ʒmnbʒuʒine.

Clajdēn opōuʒm ʒn a lāʒn,
 Dā ʒaj ʒlaʒo co nʒočʒnāʒn;
 ʒʒnden co n-dač oʒn buʒdē,
 Alcaʒ tul apceuzt ʒurʒn.

ʒon ʒužē ʒʒmʒ ʒerʒuʒ ʒʒm, 2ʒ tabuʒte dar ʒm morʒʒm;
 ʒo ʒʒn a oʒnē ar eʒʒm,
 2o ʒocraʒar a moʒʒluʒm.

Two ruddy cheeks of softest lineament, (Naisi's)
 Ruby lips, brows of the chafer's hue ;
 Two rows of splendid teeth,
 Like pearls of snowy white. precious jewels

Splendid was his vesture fair,
 Among the mighty of Alba's host ;
 A cassock of bright purple, rightly shaped,
 With its fringe of brilliant gold.

A garb of satin,—precious ornament,
 Wherein were an hundred polished gems ;
 For whose fair fitting, brightly shone,
 Fifty hooks of silver.

A sword of golden hilt graced his hand,
 Two blue-green javelins of brightful point ;
 A dirk with osprey's of golden gleam,
 And a hilt of silver on it.

Sent to us was Fergus fair,
 To bring us o'er the wide main ;
 He gratified his dignity at a feast,
 His redoubtable might, (the sons of Usnach) were slain.

However

However long they would be on the plain,
 Ulad's (nobles) at the beck of Conor ;
 I would in every quarter catch
 The visage of Naisi, son of Usnach.

Break not the strings of heart,
 Tho' you seized on my early dawn ;
 The affection is stronger that lives,
 Tho' my darling be dead, O ! Conor !

“ What is it you hate most that you see ? ” says
 Conor. “ Thou thyself, and Eogan, son of Du“ threcht,” says she. “ Thou shalt be a year in “ Eogan's bed then,” says Conor. Conor then gave her over to Eogan. They drove the next day to the assembly of Murthemny. She was behind Eogan in a chariot. She looked, that she might not see both her gallants, towards the earth.
 “ Well, Deirdri,” says Conor, “ it is the glance “ of a ewe between two rams, you cast between me “ and Eogan.” There was a large rock near ;
 she hurled her head at the stone, so that she broke her skull, and killed herself.

This is the exile of the sons of Usnach, and the cause of the exile of Fergus, and of the death of Deirdri.

Such is the tale, from which the flowery Keating took his account of the origin of the war of Cuailgne. The language is extremely difficult, and can be understood but by a few in Ireland at the present day; the orthography is obsolete and provincial. Here, and with Keating, the catastrophe is the same. The story is not of Alba, (Scotland), but of Eiri, (Ireland), and therefore the point of the originality of Mr. M'Pherson's DARTHULA is here completely lost, and the imposture utterly refuted.

Now we will give one or two of those wild rhapsodies attributed to Oisín. He never wrote them, but the assumption of his name was a device of the Irish poets of the eighth, ninth, and tenth centuries, to inspire their countrymen against the Danes, by describing the valour of their ancestors against them and all other foreign invaders. But first let us exhibit Colum Kill's farewell to Aran, an island off the western coast of Ireland, by no means that, or those, off the coast of modern Scotland.—This is introduced for the sake of comparison with Deirdri's LAMENTATION, as to the style and metre. When we come to compare the Fenian poems with the monstrous modern imposture, we will be more minute

minute as to the accurate and intricate prosody of the language, which the Scotch have forgotten, and which they must recover before they attempt again to impose on the literary world.

COLUM KILL'S FAREWEL

TO ARAN,

LITERALLY TRANSLATED.

ON this farewell we will make no other comment, but that it proves the creed of Colum Kill, as a Christian Divine, beyond possibility of doubt; and next direct the Scottish antiquity to compare it with Deirdri's Lamentation, to endeavour an ascertainment of its date. The farewell is undoubtedly Colum Kill's composition; and it is universally admitted as historic fact, that he flourished in the sixth century. It is in the identical stile and metre of Deirdri's Lamentation.

COLUM

COUJJI CJLE RO CHIJ.

Ceslebratò uajmji t' Drujini,
 Ceslebratò truaž, mar řajlm;
 9Hji com čur řojn eo h-š,
 H š řođlaj on řljin!

Ceslebratò uajmji t' Drujini;
 H e éraduř mo érojde,
 řan beře čjan an a tonouřb,
 Eřojn řronžujb naeni njie!

Ceslebratò uajmji t' Drujini;
 Do érajò mo érojde cmeđajl,
 H ē m ceslebratò řa đeojò;—
 Ue! nj dom đeđjn an teđajl!

Ceslebratò uajmji t' Drujini;—
 H ē an ceslebratò tuđac;
 H lán t' arijljb řnřa;—
 9Hji řan řlla um čurač!

Đi řnođan,

COLUM KILL SUNG.

Farewel from me to Aran,
 A sad farewel to my feeling ;
 I am sent eastward to Hy,
 And it separated since the flood !

Farewel from me to Aran ;—
 It is it anguishes my heart,
 Not to be westward at her waves,
 Amidst groupes of the Saints of Heaven !

Farewel from me to Aran ;
 It has anguished my heart of faith,
 It is the farewel lasting ;—
 Oh ! not of my will is the separation !

Farewel from me to Aran ;—
 It is the farewel sad ;
 And she filled of angels fair ;—
 I without an attendant in my cot !

O ! Modan,

21 Ghoðajni mōjn, nje Mejnfejn,
 Se-až ðujt jn nj rājōjn,
 Mjst dom euj an aštjn;—
 Tu-ſa v-ſhaſtað an Arujni!

Ué! k ejan, on ueh k ejan!
 Rom eujreð o Arujni tšar,
 So nja ſlož Monajš amaé,
 Ar jneujò na n-Albanaé.

Mac Dē bš, ón mac Dē bš;
 K e nom eujrj eo hš;
 Se tuz dennae mōjn jn rač,
 Arja rōjni na n-aštjraé!

Arja tšjan, on Arja tšjan,
 Mo éen ložgef jnntj tšar;
 Jnann bejt ſo na h-úrj žlojn,
 K ſo újn Pójl acar Pheðajni!

Arā tšjan; on Arja tšjan,
 Mo éen ložgef jnntj tšar,

Jnann

* From this forward to the end, the metre is changed from alternate to direct.

† The Poet here compares Aran to the setting sun, from its western situation; or, because, from being the most

O! Modan great, son of Merseng, Fair prosperity to thee what I say,
 I being sent a far ;—
 You established in Aran!

Alas! its far ;—Alas! its far,*
 I have been sent from Aran west,
 Towards the population of Mona east,
 To visit the Albanachs! (men of Alba.)

Son of the living God,—O! Son of the living God ;
 It is He sent me to Hy ;
 It was He gave, great the benefit,
 Ara as the habitation of PENITENTS!

Aran, thou Sun,—Oh! Aran, thou sun,†
 My affection is buried in her westward ;
 Alike to be under her earth pure,
 As under earth of Peter and Paul!

Aran, thou Sun,—O! Aran, thou Sun,
 My love lies in it west,

if

most frequented by Penitents, and from the eminent sanctity of its Monks, it shone as a luminary among the other islands sacred to heavenly contemplation.

Inann bejê xa žuž a clujš;
 Do neč k bejê a xočnyce!

Žna žman, on Žna žman!
 Mo čen lojžef juncj čjan;
 Žac aen tēto xo na húnj žlojn,
 Noča n-xajcjni fújl djabujl!

Žna nažm, on Žna nažm,
 Majnš k bjōbujō dī mar ažn;
 Žo tužan do tar a čenni,
 Žajroj fačžujl k jxynni!

Žna nažm, on Žna nažm,
 Majnš k bjōbujō dī mar ažn;
 Tēd af a clann k a epōd,
 beō xejn čall an dnoč čura!

Žna nažm, on Žna nažm,
 Majnš k bjōbujō dī mar aen;
 K žo tčjštō ajnžl do njm,
 Da xk žac-aen lā k tpečtmanj!

Čjž Šabnjál žac dominač,
 Uajn k ē Čnjšt no ōrōajš;

Caeca

If within the sound of its bell,
Alike is it for any one as to be in happiness.

Aran, thou Sun, O! Aran, thou Sun,
My love is buried in it west ;
Each who goes under her earth pure,
Him sees not eye of Devil.

O! Aran blessed, O! Aran blessed,
Woe to him who is inimical to it also ;
For to him is given for it,
Shortness of life and Hell.

O! Aran blessed, O! Aran blessed,
Woe to those who are inimical to it also ;
Their children and their cattle waste,
They themselves at the otherside* will be in bad condition.

O! Aran blessed, O! Aran blessed,
Woe to him at once who is her enemy ;
And that Angels come from on high
To visit it every day in the week.

Gabriel on every Sunday comes,
For it is Christ so ordered ;

B b

Fifty

* Meaning the other side of the grave

Caeca aingel, n̄j řác řanni, 2łz bennac̄aḏ a h'ajęřneanni.

Řača luaji, ōn! řača luaji,
 Țıř Ȟıćeřl, mōri an buajḏ,
 Țıřča 2łingel, majč a m-bēř, 2o bennac̄aḏ a řıřlēř.

Řača m̄ajře, ōn! řača m̄ajře,
 Țıř Rapael arza nařč,
 2o bennac̄aḏ a Țıře čall,
 Re řreřtal aře 2łřanni.

Čeḏařı čřuajḏ, ōn! çeḏařı čřuajḏ,
 Țıř Uřjal, mōri an buajḏ;
 řo mbennac̄eanni řó čřı 2ı řořłřı ūřḏa ainglę.

Řača ḏjardajı, ōn! řača ḏjardajı,
 Țıř Sařjal, mōri an řıajı, řo řřařłřıni řač 2ē ḏo řııı
 řoř lēccaḏ loma an lā řıı.

2ja hařıe, ōn! 2ja hařıe,
 Țıř Rumeul řa lıře.

řurab

Fifty angels, (not weak the cause,)
Sanctifying her masses.

On every Monday, Oh! on every Monday,
Cometh Michael, great the advantage,
Thirty Angels, propitious their practice,
To bless her churches.

On every Tuesday, Oh! on every Tuesday,
Cometh Raphael, of mysterious power,
To bless her mansion there,
To maintain the piety of Aran.

Wednesday hard, Oh! Wednesday hard, Cometh Uriel, great the advantage ;
Thrice to bless
Her churches high, angelic.

Every Thursday, Oh! every Thursday,
Cometh Sariel, great the treasure,
Dispersing God's benefits from Heaven
On bare stones that day.

On Friday, Oh! on Friday,
Cometh Ramael and his host,

Šurab lomnān zac fūjl dē,
D'ajngljb fīma fīn ālle.

O ēuan in Šarmanj ille, Šo h-ājc Lajgen Lečlynce,

* * * * *

* * * * *

Čjg Mujre, mačajr mje dē, Cona mujrač mar en rē.
bjo Dlyngl amfā šrafujn,
benmačajo j dja fačajrn.

Šjn co beč do bečad am,
Dlēt ečtēčt Dlyngel Dman, ferjn na zac bečad fo mjn,
Ečtēčt rē na ccešlebrajb.

So that every eye is satiated by him,
Of Angels fair, truly bright.

From Garman's (Wexford) coast hither,
To Leinster's stream of Leighlin,

* * * * *

* * * * *

Cometh Mary, Mother of the Son of God,
And her charge along with her.
Angels are in the groupe,
They bless it on Saturday.

Tho' there should be no existing life,
But hearing of the Angels of Aran,
Better than any life under Heaven,
To hear their Hymns of praise.

We now return to the consideration of the imposition of the late pompous publication, purporting to be the originals of Mr. M'Pherson's pretended translation. One or two specimens of detached little rhapsodies of the poetry ascribed to Oisín, which are of exactly accurate diction and prosody, will be sufficient to shew that the work alluded to, is a post original translation of Mr. M'Pherson's original original lucubrations, in corrupt unmetrical Erse ; for his poems of Oisin, it must be repeated, never existed in the form in which he has given them, before they appeared from the framing of his plastic powers.—Specimens of this nauseously irregular bombast have been frequently, from time to time, ushered into public since the first coming forth of these pieces, pretended to be translations of Gaelic poems, in order to try the pulse of the Irish. The merited contempt, however, with which they passed unnoticed, encouraged the uttering of this monstrous imposition on the literary world.

Mr. M'Pherson, himself, lived to give his sanction to the imposture ; a conduct equally ingenuous with his having an advertisement inserted in a Dublin newspaper, affecting to be from some native Irishman, desiring the public to withhold judgment upon his poem of Fingal, as the true one would shortly make its appearance. This had a double object. It gave publicity to his intended publication, and by a dark insinuation, it was intended to be inferred, that as no such publication was thought of then in Ireland, and of course would not appear, it was to be directly concluded, that no works of Oisin, or any attributed to him, could be had in this island ;
and,

and, therefore, that Alba, or modern Scotland, alone must glory in the nativity and genius of the heroic Bard, as well as in the valiant deeds of the heroes he celebrated. This, it must be owned, is very disingenuous craft, which, coupled with his affected disdain of the Irish History and Language, is little short of an utter disregard of principle. A preconceived conviction in him and his adherents, that the knowledge of the Irish language had perished in its native land, without a solitary vindicator of its rights, could alone give confidence to such presumption. They indeed have been, and are enviably situated compared with us. They are supported by all the wealth, dignity, talent, power, and influence of their favoured clime; while it has been considered here an unprofitable, if not a detrimental, vulgar and ridiculous acquirement for ages back, to know, or shew a disposition to know, the finest medium of communication ever spoken in Europe, the Irish Language.—Yet here its forceful, expressive, living vigour is known, in all its elegant accuracy and correctness, but hitherto fastidiously neglected; there a fine, but debased and corrupt, dialect of it is endeavoured, might and main, to be imposed on the world as the mother tongue.—But it is in vain for the perverse of Alba any longer to maintain

maintain the field of imposture; these small specimens of comparative fact will put the effrontery of fabrication and presumption to disgrace and rejection for ever.

We have abundance of those wild romantic rhapsodies of poems attributed to Oisín, the son of Finn, the son of Cumhal. Some are also attributed to Fergus, of romantic lips, (f)h-béol,) the brother of Oisín, who was emphatically stiled (f)le na f*éine*;) “the Bard of the Fenii,” that is, of the ancient Irish militia;—Mr. M’Pherson’s heroes of Fingal. We have many too, attributed to Cailti, son of Ronan, another of the chieftains of the Fenii, who was Finn’s nephew and confidential friend. Oisín and Cailti are traditionally mentioned as having lived until the arrival of St. Patrick on the Christian mission in Ireland. All the poems attributed to these heroes are in the form of details to him of all the great transactions that happened in their days, and particularly of the great deeds and wondrous exploits of Finn, Gaul, Oscar, son of Oisín, and the other Fenian heroes.

The first of the two following specimens, is a short wild story on the song of a Blackbird, said to be delivered

delivered by Oisín to St. Patrick. The main object seems a description of romantic scenery; the mention of Finn's expedition to Lochlin; and his delight in rural scenes. The next is to introduce the reader to the extreme youthful prowess and valour of the renowned Oscar, who subdues and kills, after a desperate contest, a redoubtable foreign hero. These are here introduced as being less common and better preserved than many others, perhaps of greater import in point of subject, and which may hereafter make their appearance in equal correctness. Here the alliterations, unions, correspondences, auricular harmonies, and other particulars requisite to the accuracy and elegance of Irish poetry, are most scrupulously and chastely preserved; and upon this account are they particularly exhibited; as by direct comparison, the gross irregularity and incorrectness of the unmetrical bombast in which the modern fabrication is conceived, will be completely exposed.

Ξ ΛΟΝ-ΔΙΟΒΗ ΔΗΘΙΡΕ ΔΙΝ ΧΗΔΙΡΝ;— ΟΙΣΙΝ ΡΟ ΧΗΔΙΝ.

βῆμι γῆν, α ἰοῖν δ'αῖρε ἀν Χαῖρην!
Νῆ ἐυαλας, ἀν ἄρω 'ς ἀν μ-βῆε,
Ἐολ βυδὸ βῆμε νὰ δὸ ζυε,
Δεας τυ φα βυν το ἠτο.

Δεν ἐεολ ἦ βῆμε φα'ν μ-βῆε,
Ἥαῖς νὰε ἔκδεῖν ἠς εὐ γόη,
Δι ἠμε Δηρῖλυν νὰ εὐεε μ-βῆμι,
'S εὐ μ-βερεῖα ἀῖς ἀν το ἠόη.

Δγαρ, μαρ τῶ ἀγαμ γῆν,
Δᾶ μ-βεῖε δεῖμῖν γῆεῖλ ἀν εὐν,
Δὸ δ'ενεῖα δ'ερα εὐ οῖαν,
'S ἠῖ βῆαδὸ ε'αῖρε ἀν δ'ια εὐ γόη.

Δι εὐῖε Λοῦλαν, νὰ γρεδὸ ἠ-γοῖμ, ῖυαῖν Ἥαε Κύβαν, νὰ εὐοῖν ἠτερε,
Δι τ-ῆν το ἐῖεῖ ἀνογ,
Δε γῆν α γῆεῖλ τυε εὐ δεῖδ.

Dojpe an éajm an éojll úo éjaj,
 Hap a n-ðénoðj an fjhann foð;
 Alr úlle 'far éaejme a epamm,
 'S eð do cupneð am an lon.

Szolğajpe lojm dojpe an Chajm, bújere an dajm ó fjhail na ccaer,
 Ceol le ceodlad fjm zo moé,
 Laéajm ó loé na ttrj ccael.

Cerna fpaesé um éhmuacajm éujm,
 fetğajl dobnójm opujm dá loé,
 Soða flajm gljmm na ffuaz,
 Lonğojpe cuac émje na fcoð.

Soða zadar glenna caejm,
 H zújm fjhlajm éaesé na felğ;
 Tajm na ceon az tmal zo moé,
 Alrceé ó épájğ na ceoé n-ðerğ.

Alr tpað do miam fjmm 'f an fjhann,
 Dob amfa leo fhad na epl,
 fá bjn leofan fuğle lon,
 Soða na ceooc leo njm bjmm.

fmm.

THE BLACKBIRD OF THE GROVE OF CARNA, FROM OISIN.

The Versification from a literal Translation,
by Mr. WILLIAM LEAHY.

HAIL tuneful bird of sable wing,
Thou warbler sweet of Carna's grove! *
Not lays more charming will I hear
Tho' round th' expansive earth I rove.

No melody's more soft than thine,
While perch'd thy mossy nest beneath :
How sad to miss thy soothing song !
When harmony divine you breathe.

O son of Alphron cease thy bells,
Cease thy hollow-sounding strain :
To Carna's grove thine ear incline,—
Thou wilt o'ertake thy psalms again.

O did'st

* Derrycarn in the county of Meath.

O didst thou hear its mournful tale!
 Didst thou, as I, its story know!
 Thou wouldst forget thy God awhile,
 And down thy cheeks would torrents flow.

Found was the bird on Lochlin's plains,
 (Where purling flows the azure stream)
 By Comhal's son, for goblets fam'd,
 Which bright with golden splendor beam.

Yon lofty wood is Carna's grove,
 Which bends to west its awful shade,
 Where pleas'd with Nature's wild display,
 The Fian's—noble race! delay'd.

In that retir'd and dusky wood,
 The bird of sable wing was lay'd:
 Where the majestic oak extends
 His stately boughs in leafy shade.

The sable bird's harmonious note,
 The lowing hind of Cora's steep,
 Were wont, at morning's early dawn,
 To lull the mighty Finn asleep.

The noise which haunts the weedy pond,
 That into triple straight divides :
 Where cooling in the chrystal wave,
 The bird of silver plumage glides.

The twitt'ring hens on Croan's heath,
 And from yon water-girded hill,
 The deepening voice of gloomy woe,
 Sad, pensive, melancholy shrill.

The eagle's scream from Foat's vale,
 From the tall pine the cuckoo's song,
 The music of the hounds, that fly
 The coral-pebbled strand along.

When liv'd brave Finn, and all his chiefs ;
 The heath did more the heroes please—
 Than church or bell they'd dearer deem
 The sable bird's melodious lays.

ԼԱՆԾԻ ԾԻՉՆԸ ԳԻՅԸ ԾՐԵՕՅՆ.

Ե՛նօ ան ա՛յր ան Ե՛նօ սօ յ՛հար,
’Տ ջօ Լա՛ ան Ե՛րայէ, Ե՛րօ Ծ’ ա՛ ճարմ;
Չի թհատարե՛, նա մ-Ե՛րօ մ-Ե՛ր,
Ն’ յ ճան Գայէ՛ Ե՛րօ ան Ե-այմ.

Լա՛ Ծա թԵ՛րօն յ’ Գիւն Գլայէ,
Գլանա Ե՛րօն նա մ-Ե՛ր Գե՛ր, Չի՛ր ան Ե՛նօ-Գա, Լի՛ն ա ճլօ՛ճ,
Ն’ յի Ե՛րօն Լօ Ե՛ր Լօ Ե՛ր.

Ե՛ն Ծօ Ե՛ր Ե՛ր նա՛ ան Ե՛ր Ծօ Ե՛ր ան Գլան ա՛ Ե՛ր Գան Լօն;
Ծօ մա՛ Ե՛րօն, մի՛ն Ե՛ր,
Ե՛րօն Ն’ ճան ան Ե՛ր Ե՛ր.

Ե՛ր Ե՛ր ա Ե՛ր, ան Գիւն Գլայէ, Ե՛ր Գլան մի՛ն Գլայէ՛ Ե՛ր Ե՛ր;
Ե՛ր Ե՛ր մի՛ն Գլան Ծօ Ե՛ր
Ն’ Ծօ Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ե՛ր Ծօ Ե՛ր.

Njan-Núað-Chroðaé h̄ ē m'ajm,
 Inžen do Šharb̄ mac Dolajr dēj,
 Mporj̄š Špēs, mo mallaét ajr,
 Do naxc me pe Tasle mac Tpējn.

Cped do bējn da řēna tu,
 Nā cejl do rún orm anoj̄s,
 Žhr mo Chumajrce žo brāc
 Šabajm tu lāj̄m tar a ěroj̄s.

H̄ eð řāj̄c řā ttagas řuas̄c,
 'S tuž daj̄c an žuas̄l ar mo žhē,
 Cluafa, erbāll h̄ ceim cajt,
 Tā ajr an b̄xer nāc maj̄c řžējm.

Do řubajl me an domian řo t̄rj̄,
 'S n̄jn řhazus Rj̄š ann no řlaj̄c, Nār řj̄nas aét řb̄x̄e an řhann,
 'S n̄jn žell t̄rjat m'anacal ajr,

Žhēneócað tú a mžen óž,
 Žhr mac Cubajl, nār clóð rējm;
 No žo t̄uwt̄o ajr do řžāj̄c,
 Na řēc̄t ceata t̄ā řan řřējn.

báq na Rjǵna, d'ēh žac ule
 'S ē h mō do ēuŋ an ēájé,
 Žhŋ an cenoc-ŋa d'ēh na n-žhač
 Do baŋt an ŋhan enoc an āŋ.

fŋŋt.

THE POEM OF TALC,

SON OF TRONE.*

The Versification from a literal Translation,
by Mr. WILLIAM LEAHY.

BEHOLD yon hill of slaughter rise,
(For ever will it hold the name,)
That bends its dreadful brow to west:
Dire is the cause, but great the fame.

One day brave Finn, and all his train,
No strangers to the toil of fight,
With all their great and mighty hosts
Assembled on its airy height.

O'er steed-renown'd Ierne's plain
As pac'd a maid with mournful air,—
The chiefs beheld, and saw the dame,
Than sun's refulgent beam more fair.

She

* Talc mac Tíeoín, signifies, "The Firm, Son of the Mighty."

She came, in purple robe array'd,
 And first great Comhal's son address'd,
 Whose graceful and majestic mien
 Transcendent shone above the rest.

O speak! again, exclaim'd the chief,
 And all reserve, fair maid, resign,
 For more harmonious is thy voice
 Than sweetest melody divine!—

O speak! and who thou art, declare;—
 She answer'd—Nivra* is my name :
 Where my fierce sire, great Garba, reigns
 With sway supreme,—from Greece I came.

Why hast thou fled thy father's halls?
 To me th' uncertain cause unfold :
 My arm shall ever be thy guard,—
 Then be thy sorrow's secret told.

Hear then, great chief, my woeful tale,
 And in my faithful word confide :—

The

* Νῆανι-μαῦ-ἐποταε, signifies, “ Splendid youthful form.”

The monarch pledg'd his sacred oath,
That I should be the royal bride

Of Talc, the dreadful son of Trone ;
A monster of such horrid mien,
As fills my trembling soul with fear,
And chills the blood within my vein !

Between his brawny shoulders wide,
* A Cat's terrific form he rears,
With winding tail, uplifted paw,
And fiery eyes, and frightful ears.

Thrice

* This expressive description of so familiar an animal may probably be censured, as being too pompous for so insignificant, and too terrific for so harmless a subject ; but, however, so it may appear at first sight, the consideration must entirely vanish, when we reflect that the nature of the Cat is in some degree similar to that of the Tiger or the Lion, and that the Wild, not the House-Cat, is implied :—It must have been of a very unusual size, as we find the armour of the head entirely covered with the skin, which made the knight appear as if he had a Cat's head,—for which reason, he is called in the poem, “The Cat-headed chief.” The warriors, in ancient times, were accustomed to wear on their armour the skins of the wild beasts they had slain :—thus the celebrated casque of Ulysses,

Thrice round the earth I sought the aid
 Of ev'ry king,—but sought in vain,
 None dar'd to vindicate my cause,—
 I now implore the Finian train.

Sweet maid, I'll be thy sure defence,
 Comhal's conquering son replied :—
 Nor shalt thou go,—before the strength
 Of all the Finian host be try'd.

Full

Ulysses, as he and Diomed prepare to go as spies to the Trojan camp, is described by Homer as covered with the skin of a wild boar.

ἔκλισθε δὲ λευκοὶ ὀδόντες
 Ἀρτεΐδολλος ὑὸς θαμίης ἔχον' ἔνθα κ' ἔνθα,
 Ἐὖ κ' ἐπισταμίνως.

Hom. L. X. λιγ. 263.

without, in order spread,
 A boar's white teeth grinn'd horrid o'er his head.

POPE.

The skin of the Lion-Cat in Persia, described by Dr. Goldsmith, as larger and more fierce than even the wild one, may have covered the helm of this eastern warrior, as he very probably was a Persian prince.

Full seven legions in thy cause
 Expert the brazen spear to wield,
 Shall conquer,—or expire, and leave
 Their breathless bodies on the field.

Ah!—by thy val'rous hand, O! Finn,
 I tremble, lest thy might be vain,—
 Beneath his stroke, from whom I fly,
 An hundred hosts would press the plain.

Resplendent maid, of heav'nly mien,
 Whose yellow tresses curling fold,
 And play around thy lily neck,
 More beaming bright than purest gold,

No region of th' expansive earth
 Could e'er a mighty champion boast,
 Whose conqueror would not be found
 Amid the Finian's fearless host.

Then distant, landing on the shore,
 Appear'd a chief of stately mien,—
 Upon whose dire and hideous crest
 A Cat's fierce front was dreadful seen.

To where th' assembl'd legions stood,
 He sternly turn'd with conscious might,
 And proudly frowning on their chief,
 Demanded or the maid, or fight.

Three hundred leaders brave, who rush'd
 Where'er the fire of battle burn'd,
 Advanc'd to meet the stranger's rage,—
 But from his steel—ah! ne'er return'd.

O! Patrick, of the creed severe,— Full ten hundred heroes slain,
 We lost that day in dreadful fight,
 Which sad depress'd our weaken'd train.

When Osgar view'd the slaughter'd pile,
 Fierce fury fir'd his rolling eye,
 Finn's leave he ask'd,—while I intent,
 Reluctant heard the chief's reply :

Go, noble youth, I give thee leave,
 Though much thy gloomy fate I dread,—
 Forget not now thy deeds of fame ;
 May glory beam around thy head.

For five long days, and tedious nights,
 Both heroes contest dire maintain'd,—
 Their weary limbs not eas'd by rest,
 Or fainting frames by food sustain'd.

Great Talc at length sinks pale to earth,—
 In death his swimming eye-balls roll ;
 Yielding to Osgar's force supreme,
 He, gasping, breathes his mighty soul.

Three shouts resound aloud in air,
 And dreadful echo o'er the plain,—
 One to deplore our slaughter'd host,
 And two of joy, that Talc was slain.

But Nivra fair, appall'd to see,
 Such direful carnage all around ;—
 Her crimson cheek grew silver pale,—
 She lifeless sunk upon the ground !

And when the royal maid expir'd,
 Whose wrongs so bravely were redress'd,
 More than the hosts of heroes slain,
 It fill'd with sorrow ev'ry breast.

O ! Patrick

O! Patrick of the crosier fair,—
 This dreadful tale will e'er be told;
 Yon mount's the hill of slaughter dire,
 Which now thy wond'ring eyes behold.

BOTH these specimens are the genuine effusion of the genius that produced the poems attributed to Oisín, all of which have such an uniformity of easy stile, diction, and mètre, as pronounces them the work of one man, over whose name is spread the veil of eternal oblivion, from the assumption of the name of the son of Finn, in conversation with St. Patrick. Vast numbers of these poems are still preserved in Ireland, written and by rote.—They are even still the great source of long nights' entertainment in the Irish parts of Ireland; together with the old romances, or Finian stories, (Ἱσθῆτα or Ἱσθῆλα ἡσαναῖδῆτα) all upon the exploits of the Finian Heroes, or ancient Irish militia. With every one of these, and all other stories in the Irish language, Mr. M'Pherson appears to have been perfectly conversant; nor has he omitted one of their beautiful expressions or interesting episodes. In the execution of his scheme, however, he has been totally regardless of epochs, and, with fastidious insolence, he rejects the very sources of his reputation, tion, Irish history. He seized upon all its romantic splendour, and jumbled together the majesty of several ages into an uniform mass of his own contrivance. This will appear evidently enough from the present publication, but will be further manifested from the succeeding transactions of the Gaelic Society. Mr. M'Pherson lived some years in the quarter of Ireland where he could best get acquainted with our written sources of amusement, the county of Limerick, where a name-sake and cousin-german of his kept a little school, and well did he profit of the opportunity.

As these two specimens of the poetry attributed to Oisín, are produced for the purpose of proving that the modern gorgeous publication, as it were, of the original of the Oisín of Scotland, (i. e. of Mr. M'Pherson) is a post-original, we must descant a little on the nature of ancient Irish poetry.— This is a most peculiar and difficult task. The ancient language of Ireland underwent the cultivation of several successive ages, and was brought to an Acme, surpassing much even the elegant rotundity of Greek phraseology. This would be known to enlightened Europe, were it not for the casualty of the school of the west having been suppressed before

before the invention of printing, and that every attempt to profit of that invention since has been fatally interrupted by some public calamity. The publication of every thing valuable in this language, by the Fathers of Donegal, was unfortunately prevented by the troubles in the time of the first Charles, by Cromwell's usurpation. They had procured a fount of type for this purpose, which, when forced to fly, they took with them to Louvain, where some fragment of it yet remains; and when Anne thought to establish professorships of this language, in all her universities, she was baffled by the interested art of the Duke of Ormond, who framed a nonsensical jumble of words, (C'É Dan Dub ób an, i. e. a black ox eat a raw egg,) to impress the Queen with the notion that the most elegant, expressive, and original language of Europe, was a barbarous dialect, like the barking of a dog. There is no language in which an assemblage of harsh and barking sounds may not be framed. In the language in which I write, though now brought by effort of eminent genius, to a very high degree of perfection,—though well cultivated for above three centuries,—it is easy to frame barking nonsense;—for instance, of, which, what, why; and so of any other language.

In Irish poetry there are several principal circumstances to be observed : The first is, that it must consist of Stanzas of four lines, (or Quartans,) including a determinate sense ;—each line, or quartan, must consist of seven syllables—and no irregular ellipsis is admitted, that is, no poetic license, as it is so abusively called, is admissible : Mr. Clerke has decided this in his comments on Homer :—There must be alliteration between principal parts of speech, nouns, pronouns, and verbs, which the Irish poets name CONCORD : There must be an agreement of words and syllables, which they call correspondence ;—there must be union, or auricular harmony, which is to have the vowels and diphthongs correspond in sound and rhythmical termination, not at all dependant on unity, like English rhyme, but similarity of letters. These are the prominent features of Irish poetry, to all of which annexes many a critical adjunct. In no one principal, or secondary instance, has the author of the Post-original shewn himself aware of this necessary accuracy ; nor, indeed, could he ; for, the elegant accuracy of the language is now utterly forgotten by the modern Scots. Their corrupt and debased dialect bears the same comparison to ours, that the contemptible modern Greek does to ancient Attic purity. All the requisites of Irish

Irish poetry are faithfully maintained in the two preceding instances.—Take another, the description of Finn's Greyhound.

COBHARTRCHUIGHE CON FhINN GHIC CUIGHUJL.

THE MARKS OF FINN MAC COMHAL'S
GREYHOUND.

Coḡa bujḡe bʒ aḡ bhraḡ,
 2l dā taeḡ duḡ 'ḡa tār ʒel;
 Drujḡm ʒuaḡḡe ḡḡ cenn ʒelḡ,
 ʒ dā éluajḡ éoraḡa éom-ḡeḡḡ.

“ Yellow legs had Bran,
 “ Both her sides black and her belly white ;
 “ A speckled back over her loins,
 “ And two crimson ears, very red.”

This instance is in (DÁN DÍRÉÉ) direct metre, but the former is in a species of it, denominated ógláéaḡ, a word well expressed by the Italian recitavo, whence the French recitativo, and means with us conversation; it is our “pesnatus rebus agendis,” and is an alternate measure. The fabricator has aimed aimed at writing his solecism in this metre, but his gross ignorance has baffled him completely. He has sometimes six, sometimes seven, sometimes eight, and often nine syllables in a line, but this irregularity is even surpassed by his scandalous disregard of correctness of language, and ignorance of poetic concord. In the late decline of the Gaelic language, he thought he could impose; but he should study more, if he would expect to succeed in imposition upon the REVIVING knowledge of genuine Gaelic. I would not dishonour my native language with quotations from this jargon, but I refer the Gaelic reader to any passage of the awkward fabrication, but particularly to p. 4; beginning of Fingal, p. 8, id. Temora, p. 268, 292, 308. Mr. M'Farlan seems to have been an excellent Latin scholar, but he was a very incorrect Gaelic PRETENDER. In p. 292, of Temora, he has a line describing the agitation of Finn on the death of Oscar, at the battle of Gabhra, in base, modern, corrupt Erse,

“Tha cridhe na b'aoise fo spairn;”

The original Irish of which he knew not, but Mr. M'Pherson knew it well, and gave it very pathetic expression expression in English. The line is attributed to Finn, and is Ἠὼ ἐμοῖδε ἄς ἰῆμνῆς μαρ ἰου,

“My heart leaping as a Black-Bird,”

Which Mr. M'Pherson expresses by the words, “The heart of the aged beats over thee,” which words Mr. M'Farlanaped to translate in his corrupt irregular dialect.—Mr. M'Pherson himself, throughout, affects to translate quartans of Gaelic poetry, as his whole work exhibits a train of short sentences, involving each a determinate meaning. This undoubtedly he considered as subservient to his purpose, as the use of Irish names of historic celebrity, which he considered paramount to imposing on all Gaelic readers, as well Iernian as Albanian. The fact is, that the profound conjecture of Johnson, is the real fact. Mr. M'Pherson's “poems of Oisín” never appeared in his original form, before his own framing and formation, for which he must be allowed the credit of genius, but must be denied the principle of candour. To rescue his reputation, however, from the charge of unqualified obloquy, it must be recorded that he acknowledged to an elegant oppoment, the late Bishop of Limerick, the Rt. Rev. Doctor Barnard, Dr. Goldsmith's Dean of Derry, in his retaliation, that "Fingal was an original, but "that the characters were Irish." This burst of candour was in remuneration of Dr. Barnard's delicately polite manner of treating him in the developement of the imposture. He spent three weeks on a visit with Dr. Barnard in London. I had the honour of his Lordship's intimacy, and, I am confident, nothing short of truth and liberality ever stained his virtuous lips.

F f nent,

No wonder the modern Scots should be utterly ignorant of Gaelic prosody, since Messrs. Campbell, Mac Muir, and Mac Gilleoin, the worthies who addressed Mr. Lhuyd, a century ago, upon the publication of his Archæologia, prove by their awkward efforts at versification, that they had nearly forgotten the prosody of the language; indeed they forgot its accuracy altogether, as well as that of the language. But, in either, they shine far above the modern Fabricators, and they merge them, indeed, into utter darkness by their truth and sincerity. They acknowledge and pride in the fact of their descent from the Scots of Ireland, as do all the candid of Alba (or modern Scotland) to this day; day; while the perverse and crafty upholders of imposture disdain the truth, and appear to feel it a galling wound to their silly pride, to admit, and therefore they reject the truth of history. But were they to publish as much gorgeous falsehood in elaborate jargon as would fill the Atlantic or Pacific ocean, supported even by illusive depositions, (for such do they produce,) it would not be capable of obliterating the venerable record of veracity, sanctioned by the concurrent testimony of all sincere investigation, through the various mazes of revolving ages. I have, in my time, met and conversed freely with many Highland Gentlemen, and not one of them ever denied the historic fact, of the Albanian Scots being descendants of the Irish; nay, they would appear indignant at mention of those men of mighty name who have written to the contrary. As to the refutation of Mr. M'Pherson's system, they considered, as indeed they should, that the Rev. and venerable Doctor Shaw, Messrs. Laing and Pinkerton, had done enough to vindicate "their country from the charge of not having such sturdy moralists, as would love truth better than Scotland." As to Ireland, O'Conor, O'Halloran, and Dr. Barnard are sufficient authority to convict the forgery. It is remarkable of the Irish language, that that where it is spoken at all throughout Ireland, it is spoken without being subject to the anomaly which designates the patois of France, or the shire-dialect of England. Indeed, to such a pitch of accurate perfection was it brought of old, that its correctness lives to this day in the Irish parts of Ireland. A common labourer in the field will expose his companion to ridicule, if he, by any inadvertency, happen to break a concord, or commit any other error of diction or accentuation, to the hearty amusement of those around him. This, it is submitted, must be an irrefragable proof of the ancient general correctness and cultivation of this language. It is also spoken, with considerable accuracy, in many parts of the Highlands of modern Scotland. This, I conclude, from having conversed with several Gentlemen of that country with the greatest ease and familiarity; and, I must add, that none of them refused an immediate and unequivocal acknowledgment that the Gaelic of Scotland was a dialect of the mother tongue of Ireland; as well as that the Highland Scots were the descendants of a colony from this, the mother country. They ever plainly declared, they were perfectly aware of the disingenuousness of modern fabrications; and that they knew, from undisputed tradition, tradition, that Finn, Oisín, Goll, Osgar, and all the other Finnian heroes were Irish, not Albans. What avails it, then, to produce the attested declarations of illiterate, and the laboured essays of literary men, in opposition to an historical fact, otherwise generally acknowledged? The similarity of a few names, and the likeness of some circumstances in the modern figments, to those in the ancient poems, have imposed on the ignorance of the one, while the ability displayed in the execution of imposture, has fascinated and deluded the other. The following anecdotes confirm the position here laid down: That eminently ingenious, and profoundly erudite prelate, the Rev. Dr. Young, the late amiable and benevolent bishop of Clonfert, but previously a most respectable and respected senior fellow of Trinity College, Dublin, (in which University I had the happiness of spending nearly twelve years under his kind and generous tutelage,) was warmly affected towards the cultivation of Irish literature. In the summer of 1784, he traversed the Highlands in search of Gaelic poetry. He was directed to a bookseller in Perth, with whom, it was asserted, that the original of Mr. M'Pherson's poems were deposited. On inspection, however, it proved to be an ancient Irish manuscript, on vellum, containing taining historic tracts, and several genealogies; particularly one of the illustrious house of O'Neill. Upon being introduced to a literary Lady, a widow, of the name of Mac Donald, who taught her daughters Gaelic, she was pleased to ask him, "Pray, Sir, are you an Irishman?" "I am, Madam," was the answer. "I shall soon prove that," said she. Upon which she handed him an Irish Testament, and requested him to read two or three verses in it. He did accordingly, and she said, "I clearly see you are, Sir." He then asked, "Madam, is it in this you teach these young Ladies?"—Her daughters were present. "Yes, Sir," answered she. "Why not instruct them in the bible published by authority of the synod of Argyle?" resumed the doctor. "O! Sir, why should I teach them a corrupt dialect, when I can instruct them in the pure mother tongue?" was her answer. In like manner, talking to an old Gentleman who repeated some Finnian poetry to him, he asked him, "Where, Sir, or whence have you got these?" The old Gentleman replied, "We have got them traditionally from our ancestors, who originally came from Ireland." The veracity of this amiable prelate, will never be called in question. It would be notorious to all the world,

if

if Gaelic literature were more cultivated, that it is only of late the modern Scotch shew shame of their origin. Gædhaltacht Alban, the Gædelicity of Alba, is the old expression for the Highlands; and Gaelic Albanach, Aalbanian Gaelic, for Erse, even among themselves, to distinguish them from their original Irish nativity. For the present, farewell, Mr. M'Pherson.

FINIS.

ADVERTISEMENT.

IN the compilation of the foregoing sheets, some inadvertencies have escaped, which it is deemed necessary here to rectify. In page 10, of “The “Death of the Children of Usnach,” the Latin quotation in the note is, by mistake of memory, attributed to Silius Italicus, instead of Claudian. But to compensate the Reader for this error, let him accept another proof from the same Author of the position there laid down. Britain is made to boast of Stilicho’s protection :

Illius effectum curis ne bella timerem
Scotica, ne Pictum tremere, ne litore toto Prospicerem dubiis venturum Saxona ventis.

By his effectual care I need not fear
The Scotic wars, nor tremble at the Fict,
Nor all along the shore, with dread, look out
The Saxon coming with the dubious winds.

In the third Stanza of the Irish, p. 13, which was also quoted from memory, the third line should be, instead of,

Ní hé 'f' áine 'f' árdán,

the old Quartan, as follows :

Maí a ceardne, gél a ceinef.

“ Delightful their association, fair their complexion.”

And then the versification would run thus :—

Three are the causes dire of woe ;—
 How mournful is the tale to tell !
 My son, with sorrow wilt thou know
 How Touran's mighty offspring fell !

Lear's noble line,—that wing'd the air,
 Chang'd to the swan's high-soaring form ;—
 Conn, Aida, and Finola fair,
 And Fey who brav'd each gloomy storm !—

Be ever curs'd, the tongue profane,
 That bid the magic pinions grow ;—
 O ! wou'd the hellish spells were vain ;
 The second source whence tears must flow !

Usna's

Usna's brave sons, Ierne's shield,
 By circling hosts ignobly slain ;
 Pale, breathless on th' ensanguin'd field ;
 More sadly tunes the tearful strain !

Improv'd by Aify's watchful care,— Unmatch'd in Friendship's sacred course ;
 Of mien majestically fair :—
 Threefold is now pale Sorrow's source.

W. L.

So Mr. Leahy, upon mature deliberation, and a thorough acquaintance with the story, would have the versification rectified ; and therefore thus is it given.

The inadvertencies here noticed could not certainly be observed, (from his utter ignorance of the Irish language) by the redoubted reviler of Irish Literature ; the Anti-Antiquary of Ireland, the Rev. EDWARD LEDWICH, to whom the care and inspection of all Irish Productions are consigned, as we are informed, by the tremendous Reviewers, Monthly, Critical, &c. &c. The meritedly fastidious and contemptuous silence of Irish literary men, with respect to his deliberately designed and barefaced barefaced falshoods, may have imposed on the learned of England, as they have called forth the animadversion of that learned and amiable Catholic Prelate, the profound Dr. Milner, in his liberal and manly observations, during his late transit through this island. To exhibit to the amiable Rev. Doctor and all the literary world, our estimation of Mr. Ledwich, we will only apply to him the first Essay of one of our latest Poets, Thaddy O'Higgin, in the reign of Elizabeth. It was an Epigram on some flimsy pretender of his day, and is as follows:—

Fep t'ána an gilla go fíar;
 Somp'ter jagh don m-brec m-bee;
 Depp'ter neo le mo eac' eoin;
 Neo an fíhúg'ín fheoin is neo.

This, in versification not very elegant, but very literal, let Mr. Ledwich accept as his character with us.

This little man's for learning fam'd ;
The speckl'd sprat is call'd a fish ;
Each bird's nest a nest is nam'd ;
 And so's the grass-moth's, if you wish.

Grass-moth

Grass-moth is the literal English of the Irish name of the little bird, commonly called the tom-tit.

Having just met a few STANZAS of dense advice, written by the profound Mac Brodin, addressed to Donagh or Dunchad O'Brien, fourth Earl of Thomond, as was the long Ode before ; I thought it not amiss to insert them here, with a literal translation. To versify them in English may amuse some genius whom they may please.

Ógo éejepe rajun tuar, a Dhonéaró,
 Is déin mair tómaro fjaró ;
 Dhú rajun ní fágtar oréa,
 Cuirim go coraró uafis jaró.

brajé h-égnan, abair began ;
 bí go réjó fá macaró coré ;
 Ná beja breje ne gael dá gorne,
 Go breje ton taeó eile oré.

bí go mju acerjéaró cararó ;
 I cepe bíóbaró na bí taré ;
 Déin go h-áó ne veoraró, Dhoncharó,
 U leógaró do íjl ceonéaró CC aré.

Ná h-ab ím a tuigfuidéir túit ;
 Deis an éigbáil do n-í an toét ;
 Eise n-é cónnád n-dam- n-éle ;
 Tuig acá, léis mórán éort.

Ná h-ob íte, na fedaín cogad ;
 Ná h-íis eall an phad bein-beo ;
 Ná bí do gúim éo teimnád ;
 Ná eam íte, n ná íte gleo.

---

LITERAL TRANSLATION.

My four verses to you, O! Donchad,
 And do as they shall say ; (i. e. desire) ;
 A culled verse is not found of them,
 Trees with noble fruit are they.

Suspect your wisdom—say little ;
 Be quiet for what has past you ;
 Pronounce not judgment with nearest relation,
 Until the other side approach thee.*

Be mild in country of friends ;
 In enemies' country be not soft ;
 Fierce till success with strangers, Dunchad,
 Thou lion of the mighty race of Cas.

Express

* Avli alteram partem.

Express not all that shall be understood by you ;

Little the evil done by silence :

Listen to the conversation of wise men :

Understand and let much pass thee.

Refuse not peace ; avoid not war ;

Ransack not church while you're alive ;

Let not your action be from your tongue ;

Plot not treachery, and meditate not violence.

Even this little Epitome of advice would much surpass Sir William Jones's PERSIC " Advice to a Prince ;" and the learned world is left to its own judgment to determine on the mental character of the ancient literary Irish.—The trivial typographical errors in this publication, are humbly submitted to the liberal reader. If the compiler had either SALARY, ESTABLISHMENT, or PATRONAGE, perhaps they would not have escaped ; but neither of these is he blessed with ; and without ONE OR ALL of them, the INVESTIGATION and REVIVAL of IRISH LITERATURE cannot be easily effected. There are many who approach him in knowledge of the Language, ancient History and elegant Poetry of his nation ; but none, except an old gentleman, in an obscure and remote corner of the island, (Mr. Peter O'Connell, of Kilrush), has studied it so long. The assertor of this is eight and forty years old; and at the age of twelve, he could read and enjoy the beauties of all the poems attributed to Oisín: all the TALES of the Finnian heroes; Clann Touran; Clann Lir; and Clann Usnigh; and could, with puerile indignation, ridicule the wily attempts of the Scots of Alba, to make the reputed poems of Oisín their own.—COMPARATIVE FACT is his MOTTO; and if he have life and means THE FINNIAN TALES, THE FINNIAN POEMS, and every thing relative to the subject, shall appear in their genuine form. Then, it is to be hoped, the question will be finally decided and put beyond all possible equivocation and dispute.—Indeed we consider it to be so already.—That Irish scholars may not be at a loss where to find the POST-ORIGINAL of Mr. M'Pherson's Poems of Ossian—it is for sale at Mr. Richard Coyne's, No. 154, Capel-street, Dublin.

It must not escape observation, that in Ireland, PUBLIC OBJECT, which would be honourable to the nation, is shamefully lost in PRIVATE VIEW, never to be accomplished: while in England and Scotland

Scotland, public objects attract the attention and promote the exertion of dignity, wealth, power, and consequence, to the actual enriching of those who act under such propitious direction. Here envy blithes the fruit of industry; and a man of capacity to elucidate the long rejected lore of his nation, must starve in neglect, and die before he is esteemed or regretted.

Urit enim fulgore suo qui prægravat artes
 Infra se positas, extinctus amabitur idem.

HOR. Lib. 2. Epist. 1. v. 13.

All human virtue, to its latest breath,
 Finds envy never conquer'd but by death.—
 The great ALCIDES, ev'ry labour past,
 Had still this Monster to subdue at last.
 Sure fate of all, beneath whose rising ray,
 Each star of meaner merit fades away.
 Oppress'd we feel the beam directly beat,
 Those suns of glory please not till they set.

POPE.

The amiable, venerable, and Rev. Dr. SHAW, of Chelvy Parsonage, near Bristol; “the sturdy moralist who loves truth better than Scotland,” however strongly attached to his nativity, can prove, from personal knowledge, that the post-original of

Mr. M'Pherson's Poems of Ossian, is a modern fabrication ; as well as that the list of Gaelic Manuscripts given at the end of that gorgeous publication, are Irish not Albanian.

The "shattered fragments of our Literature, majestic even in ruin," dispersed and scattered as they exist, are still capable of attracting the attention of the learned world, if properly investigated. There is a vast mass of Irish Literature preserved in the Manuscript room of the Library of Trinity College, Dublin ; and to the great honour of the learned and liberal body of its Fellows, with a most respectable, generous, and enlightened English Gentleman at their head, they have benevolently determined to have their contents investigated. The Bodleian Library, in the University of Oxford, the British Museum, and the Most Noble the Marquis of Buckingham's Library, at Stowe, teem with most valuable Irish manuscripts ; rare monuments of ancient Literature. It is to be hoped that the Rev. Mr. O'Connor's "Scriptores rerum Hibernicarum," which is by this time in print, will excite the literary curiosity of Europe to the earnest investigation of Irish learning. I translated the "Annals of Innisfallen," and some tracts of the old Erehom
Laws,

Laws, into English, four and twenty years ago; but for want of private means or public patronage, I have not been able to exhibit either to the curious Public. Two or three of my friends, Mr. M'Namara, of Anderson's Court, Mr. O'Reilly, of Newstreet, Dublin, and a very ingenious youth, who has studied Irish as a dead language, have made most valuable collections of Irish manuscripts.—The Highland Societies of London and Edinburgh, have precious remnants, which it is hoped they will publish. The neglected O'Connell, has a vast treasure; and the venerable and dignified Vallancey's Cabinet, is not empty. The Chevalier O'Gorman, now living in the County of Clare, has a rare collection of annals, and other inestimable monuments. The books of Lecan and Ballimote, and the leabair bheic, or "Speckled Book" of M'Egan are in the Archives of the Royal Irish Academy; and there are besides, several valuable tracts in private hands throughout the island, of which those in the possession of the learned M'Elligott, of Limerick, are not the least worthy of estimation. There is strong probability too of the recovery of that invaluable record, "THE PSALTER OF CASHEL."

ERRATA.

ADVERTISEMENT.

Page 5, line 15, After "but," read, "it."

Proeme to the "Advice to a Prince."

Page 11, line 14, For "have already observed," read "know."

15, — 16, For "crown," read "crown'd."

27, — 3, For "ab ut," read "about."

ib. — 5, For "B RD," read "BARD."

Advice to a Prince,

Page 42, line 8, should be,

"My sov'reign's wardship as my honour'd need."

44, — To the last note should be added, a quotation from Dryden's Hind and Panther from the similarity of thought. It is as follows :

"Thy throne is darkness in th' abyss of light !

"A blaze of glory that forbids our sight!—

"O ! teach me to adore thee thus conceal'd,

"And seek no farther than thou hast reveal'd !"

48, — The parenthesis in the note should close at the word "him."

51-4. Agf i "azure" read "eye" : The

The Death of the Children of Usnach.

Page 15, line 1, Of last stanza, dele, "and."

23, — 13, after, "as I purpose not," read "says he," and dele "Conall." The next word, line 14, is to begin with a capital; "It," &c.

67, — At the end of line 2, in the marginal note, read "usage."

73, — In the last line of the note is mentioned, "this is the moral of the story." It must be added, that there is another moral to be collected, which is the danger of yielding to precipitate passion; against the dire effects of which nor worth, nor valour, of the highest description, can afford protection.

77, — It should be observed that this line,

Thósgam gac hpeine le cnam.

is to be met in Irish Poetry, and is claimed by the Albanian Scots also. The meaning is truly,

"We raised the sun-beam to the staff."

This is descriptive of Finn Mac Cumhail's standard.

Page 127, line 8, After "three," read "chiefs."

Ib. — 18, The line should be,
"Three for their deeds of fame admir'd—ador'd."

80 — First line of the Poetry at the bottom should begin with, "Ah!"

Page 161,

Page 161 — 3, For “this” read “their.”

173 — 12, For “the,” read “thy,”

175 — 14, For “brightful,” which is not language, read “frightful.”

Ib. — 15, dele, s.

177 — 5, After “of,” read “my.”

179 — 11, For “antiquity,” read “antiquary.”

196 —        In the note for “Meath,” read “Mayo;” which is the scene of both the Poems ascribed to Oissin, in this compilation; and the lake and mountains bear the same appellations to this day.—“The lake of the three Straights,” mentioned in “The Black-bird of Carna’s Grove,” is in the form of a triangle of half a square, cut off by the diameter or hypotenuse.

220, — 2, First word should be, “is.”

